"The corpses were laid out in rows," recalled Adelman, a 61-year-old York University philosophy professor known for his expertise in the phenomenology of genocide and humanitarian intervention.

"Apart from the horror and the smell, which has never left me, I was mesmerized by the kinds of wounds inflicted – children who were decapitated, women who had objects and machetes thrust into their genitals.

"This was not just a vision of murder but of the destruction of the body and its ability to reproduce. The form of death was as symbolic as the actual fact was real."

When Adelman stumbled upon that desolate scene three years ago, he was making his second trip to Rwanda since 1995, and had just co-authored a report commissioned by 19 states and 18 international agencies.

It was entitled Early Warning and Conflict Management: The Genocide in Rwanda. When Adelman arrived in Rwanda, he presented it to the Rwandan government and diplomatic community in Kigali.

Since then, he and Astri Suhhrke have written The Path to Genocide: The Rwandan Crisis from Uganda to Zaire, published this year by Transaction Books.

As much as he was moved by the genocidal orgy in Rwanda, he maintains that the Holocaust, conceived and perpetrated by Germany, remains an unparalleled event.

"The (Nazis') industrialization of murder was unique," said Adelman, whose Galician and Polish forebears settled in Canada prior to World War I.

In his view, the major lesson of the Holocaust – never again – has not been learned.

Adelman was swept into the Rwandan maelstrom because of his knowledge of refugees.

In the early 1980s and 1990s, he was respectively director of York University's Refugee Documentation Project and the Centre for Refugee Studies.

And in 1994, he and several colleagues compiled Immigration and Refugee Policy: Australia and Canada Compared, published by the University of Melbourne Press and the University of Toronto Press.

Adelman's interest in refugee problems was piqued by the drama of Vietnamese boat people streaming into Canada in the late 1970s.

After writing a review article of books dealing with the rejection of Jewish refugees during World War II, he found himself involved with Operation Lifeline, the chief Canadian organization sponsoring and helping Vietnamese refugees.

With the European Jewish refugees in mind, Adelman sprang into action. He called a meeting of rabbis, ministers, priests and lay people at his house.

Adelman thought that a letter-writing campaign on behalf of the Asian refugees would be effective. But he switched gears in mid-course upon hearing from an Ontario government official that sponsorship of the refugees might be preferable.

"We agreed to sponsor 50 families, and distributed the responsibilities," he said.

The Globe and Mail carried a story about the event, and Operation Lifeline was born.

"Within two weeks, Operation Lifeline had 66 chapters across Canada. Our own chapter overachieved its 50-family target."

Operation Lifeline had 66 chapters

By the time Operation Lifeline wound down, tens of thousands of refugees from southeast Asia had immigrated to Canada.

Adelman, a visiting professor at the Hebrew University in 1977 and 1978, has also taken an interest in Palestinian refugees, having written extensively on the subject.

In 1982, when Israel invaded Lebanon in a massive offensive widely decried by even its friends, a controversy erupted over the number of civilians, Lebanese and Palestinians, displaced by the war.

"Israel published a figure of 19,000 homeless, while OXFAM claimed in full page ads that the real figure was 600,000."

Working out of his office at the Centre for Refugee Studies, Adelman concluded that the actual number was closer to 40,000.

"The Israeli count was very honestly done," he said, "but it was marred by an embarrassing arithmetic addition error of about 10,000." It also left out refugees Israel had not been aware of.

Howard Adelman

The Palestinians provided the most accurate figures. However, their count included Palestinians who had been living in Kuwait for 10 years and had rented out their homes.

He believes that the Palestinian refugee problem, one of the most intractable of the Arab-Israeli dispute, can be resolved. He came to that conclusion after attending a conference in Greece chaired by Canada in its capacity as head of a working group on refugees.

By his account, Israeli and Palestinian Arab academics formulated a framework accord providing for the right of Palestinians to return to their homeland. By "homeland," Adelman does not mean Israel, but a future Palestinian state where refugees can be resettled.

"Those terms are presently being negotiated on the political level more or less along the lines set out by the academic negotiators."

Although he is optimistic that Israel and the Palestinians can reach a peace agreement after final status talks, he has no illusions.

"Spoilers could quickly derail the process. There are many dangers ahead, but the movement toward peace is going in the right direction, and is very powerful."

Adelman and his wife Nancy, a former importer of women's fashions and children's educational toys, have six children. They live in midtown Toronto, near the Casa Loma.

For the past year, the pair have worked for Israel Today, a cable television program. Adelman hosts and produces the program, broadcast on CTS TV on Sundays at 9 p.m., while his wife serves as artistic director.

"I was invited to do this news commentary program because the station manager believed I would be fair to all parties."

It appears he has succeeded, since the show was recently renewed. In line with his personal interests, Adelman has let viewers sink their teeth into such topics as Israel and the media, religious pluralism, human rights, Canadian policy toward Israel, Jerusalem as a megacity, and the handicapped in Israel.

Campaign Surges Ahead

UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 is nearing the $18 million mark thanks to gifts from more than 12,000 community members.

"We've done remarkably well so far," says Mel Wolfond, who is co-chairing Campaign 2000 with David Engel. "The community response has been absolutely incredible."

The Campaign jumped ahead recently when 350 volunteers raised more than $1.3 million from 4,000 donors during the first series of Answer the Call telethons. Among the volunteers were over 100 students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto who spent hours contacting contributors.

Campaigner Robyn Piasznik thanks a donor for their generous contribution.

When a young campaigner dialed up Jill Pomerantz, the long-time contributor responded by saying "Hi UJA...I'm answering the call" and increased her gift to help Jews in need. Pomerantz and all other donors who use the phrase "Hi UJA...I'm answering the call" and raise their contribution will be entered into a draw to win rewards.

"The number of volunteers who turned out and the enthusiasm that filled the rooms night after night far exceeded our wildest expectations," says Dov Altman, who is co-chairing Answer the Call telethons with Rosanne Ain and Judy Engel. "It's wonderful to see the community come together for such a worthy cause."

Barbara Naglie, who made an effort to personally greet each and every volunteer during the telethons, said campaigners "felt good about the warm and friendly atmosphere."

The next set of telethons, starting with Super Sunday, will take place October 17-20. To sign up as a volunteer, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 177.

"It was wonderful to see so many new faces and so many students," adds David Engel.

Additional funds raised during Campaign 2000 will be allocated toward new projects that assist the vulnerable, strengthen Jewish identity and rescue Jews in danger.

UJA Washington Fly-In

Seats are going fast for UJA Federation's Washington Fly-In.

Tickets for the one-day mission to the U.S. capital, scheduled for take-off on Tuesday, October 26, are $550 per person, with a minimum UJA Federation household gift of $1,000. Space can be reserved by calling Elana Carr at (416) 631-5736. Parents are invited to bring age-appropriate children for this exciting educational experience.

The VIP itinerary includes a visit to the Canadian embassy where participants will be briefed by top level officials, and to the State Department.

On Capitol Hill, participants will meet with a high profile U.S. Senate representative and members of the America Israel Public Affairs Committee to discuss U.S Israel relations.

Fly-In delegates will also have the option of touring the world renowned Holocaust Education Museum or visiting the Pentagon for a briefing on U.S.-Israel military cooperation and FBI headquarters for an update on Jewish security issues.

"The Fly-In is one of UJA Federation's most popular programs," says Honey Sherman, who is Co-Chairing the mission with Howard Sokolowski. "It is a unique opportunity to obtain inside information from our American partners vis-a-vis the Jewish community within North America, Israel and the rest of the world," adds Sherman.

"We'll be providing 12 hours of non-stop information and insight," says Sokolowski.

Lipshitz retires as CJN Yiddish columnist

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

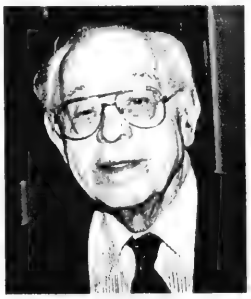
TORONTO — Sam Lipshitz, the 89-year-old elder statesman of Yiddish in Toronto, is giving up his column in The Canadian Jewish News as of this issue.

After editing 170 columns, 20 of which he wrote himself, Lipshitz is turning over the job to Alek Silver, a Yiddishist who, like Lipshitz, is a linotype operator. Silver's first column, in this issue, is a joint effort with Lipshitz.

"I always liked writing and editing," said Lipshitz, who came to Canada from Poland as a boy of 17. His first printed article in Montreal, about the anti-labor policies of Henry Ford, did not carry a byline because the editor didn't know Lipshitz, even though Lipshitz worked for him as a linotyper.

He became known nationally when, with three other leading Communists (including the late J.B. Salsberg), he split from the Communist party in 1957, denouncing the anti-Semitic outrages committed by Stalin.

During the time the Communist party was illegal in Canada under the War Measures Act, Lipshitz lived in hiding in Montreal, a warrant out for his arrest.



Sam Lipshitz

A lot of former members followed him and Salsberg into the New Fraternal Society.

Until then, he had been a leading figure in the Canadian Communist party, an editor of their various publications, and manager of Salsberg's successful campaigns to be elected to Queen's Park in Spadina riding.

He was so involved with the Young Communist League that he was fired from his job as assistant librarian at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal.

In Toronto, he eventually left his job as a linotyper (he once set type in Italian for an Italian daily) to start his own highly successful trade typesetting service, which he sold in 1972, but where he carried on as a partner until 1975 when he retired.

His promotion of Yiddish was exemplified by his work as a member of the Yiddish committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for 25 years and a leading member of Kultur Gezelshaft since 1960.

As a stalwart of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's executive committee and of the Yiddish committee, he fought for Yiddish on all fronts, whether it was for funds for Yiddish classes for adults and children, for Yiddish studies at Ontario universities, or to lobby the late Ray Wolfe, then CJN publisher, to start a Yiddish column.

During his tenure, Lipshitz's columns covered a wide range of subjects of interest to CJN readers, his contributing columnists always being Canadian. He remains proud of the fact that the column avoided political arguments.

He is upbeat about the number of CJN readers who like the twice-monthly Yiddish column, estimating the number at 2,000, and expecting that it will increase as interest in Yiddish language and literature grows.

He still lives in the condominium that he shared for many years with his wife, Mania, a devoted Yiddish teacher for 25 years. She died in 1996.

Their daughter, Dr. May Cohen, is associate dean of family practice at McMaster University, Hamilton, and their son, Joseph Lipman, is professor of mathematics at Purdue University in Indiana.

Surdin launched Yom Hashoah candles

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jules Surdin, a recent honoree of the Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs (FJMC), died suddenly at his home of a heart attack Sept. 16. He was 79.

Obituary

A past president of the Men's Club at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Surdin originated the idea of commemorating the Holocaust with Yom Hashoah candles in 1982.

Today his Remember the Six Million program, which also encourages the giving of tzedakah, has spread across North America. He was honored this summer at the FJMC 70th anniversary convention, held in the Catskills. The organization is the umbrella for men's clubs in Conservative congregations.

A native of Toronto who served in the Royal Canadian Air Force during World War II, Surdin had a long involvement with the Jewish community.

In the 1930s he served as president of Balfour Boys Club Young Judaea and president of a Habonim lodge. He is also a past president of the Council of Jewish Brotherhoods, Metro Toronto and of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region (now part of Canadian region).

In an interview two months before his death, Surdin expressed pleasure at the honor he was given. "I feel wonderful being recognized," he said. "Now my job will be as a goodwill ambassador to get [more] synagogue clubs to do this program...When I go, I'll go with a smile, because I'll know I did the right things when I was around."

Surdin is survived by his wife Pearl, daughters Sheila Einstoss, Gayle Eisenberg and Cathy Schiff, ten grandchildren, and sisters Betty Palter and Ruth Fruchtman. A brother, William, predeceased him.

THE GERALD SCHWARTZ/HEATHER REISMAN CENTRE FOR JEWISH LEARNING AT HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

Holy Blossom Temple is as much a House of Study as a House of Worship. Our Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning affords opportunity to study nearly every day of the week, at many different locations, so everybody who wishes to learn may do so. Our studies range from hands-on instruction on how to celebrate holidays at home, to Torah study, ethics, history and more. Many genuine friendships are formed through studying together. Besides our courses, we also offer many lectures by guest speakers throughout the year.

Learning At Holy Blossom Temple FALL '99

The Gerald Schwartz/ Heather Reisman Lecture Series

This lecture series features four outstanding and internationally renowned figures who'll reflect on the relationship of Jews and Judaism to the millennium.

All lectures begin at 8 p.m.

Wed. Oct. 20
Professor Hans Kung
Millennium Theology: The Christian View
What are the theological meanings of the millennium, and how should they be expressed at the end of the second millennium? How should Christianity see the Jews, Judaism and Israel, once viewed as central to the end of history?

Wed. Nov. 10
Gabriel Ben Dor
The Millennium, Jewish History and the Jewish State
An explanation of the lessons of the past 2,000 years for the Jewish people and the Jewish state – and a look at what the next millennium may bring.

Tues. Nov. 23
Irving Greenberg
The Year 2000. Is it too Late for the Messiah to Come?
An explanation of the relationship between Judaism and Messianism. When our history is replete with false Messianism, failed Messianism and broken Messianism, what credibility does Messianism still hold for modern Jews?

Tues. Nov. 30
Michael Cook
Why Wariness is Warranted: Irksome Roles Assigned to 'The Jews' in Millennialist Scenarios
Many end-time thinkers, seeing Jews and Israel as central to history's culmination, conceive 'Tribulation,' 'Rapture,' '666,' 'Anti-Christ' and 'Armageddon' with Jews in mind. Some identify the Jews as God's primary concern in history and the sole means by which to gauge the world's timetable; others see the Jews as embodying the 'Evil' to be decimated if Jesus' millennial rule is to begin. It's vital, then, at least for the next decade, that Jews be aware – and beware – of the pivotal roles assigned them in this spectrum of bizarre scenarios.

Ongoing Learning

We offer numerous ongoing classes, affording the opportunity to study sacred texts in depth. You're invited to study regularly, or as time allows.

MONDAYS

Parashat Ha-Shavuah
Michelle Lynn, Director of Education and Rabbi Yael Splansky
12:30 p.m. (beginning Oct. 4)
Start the week off right studying the weekly Torah portion. We'll include traditional and modern commentaries to enhance our discussions.

Why Ideas Matter – Part II
Rabbi John Moscowitz
7:45 p.m. (beginning Sept. 27)
Two millennia ago, the rabbis set out in the Mishnah the fundamental obligations for Jews: honouring parents; performing deeds of social responsibility; learning Torah and worshipping God; attending the sick, the bride and groom, and the mourner; and more.
These obligations were at the root of "the Talmudic postponement of gratification" (David Hartman). We'll learn the ideas behind these obligations and how each fits into and reinforces the remarkable rabbinic view of the world and the place of Jews in it.

TUESDAYS

Sea of Talmud: Tractate Rosh Hashanah
Rabbi Dow Marmur
8:00 p.m. (beginning Oct. 5)
The Talmud is the key to our understanding Judaism. The thinking of its sages has shaped our theology; their teaching determined our practices.
To understand them may be difficult, but even glimpses of the way they thought is rewarding.
Our text, the tractate Rosh Hashanah, is rich in wisdom and liturgical insights. An English translation will augment the Hebrew original text.

WEDNESDAYS

Sisterhood Torah Study
Rabbi John Moscowitz
9:30 p.m.
This class will continue studying the 'historical' Book of Judges, focusing on those fascinating leaders who knew more about politics, passion and war than about law.

SATURDAYS

Shabbat Morning Torah Study
Rabbi Dow Marmur
9:00 a.m.
All are welcome to join this always lively class, currently studying the Book of Exodus.

Other Study Opportunities

Bikur Cholim Study Workshop
Rabbi Yael Splansky
Tuesdays at 7:30 p.m.
(Oct. 26, Nov. 2 and Nov. 9)
The mitzvah of visiting the sick isn't a simple one, but it's required of every Jew. These workshops will explore the Jewish approach to sickness and healing, and to understanding the spiritual vulnerability of the sick. Whether you're interested in volunteering for the Temple's new Bikur Cholim Committee, or are simply looking for guidance on supporting sick family or friends, this series will give you the necessary tools.

The Six Corners of Jewish Theology
Rabbi Dow Marmur
Wednesdays at 8 p.m.
(Oct. 6, 13, 27, Nov. 3, 10, 17, 24, Dec. 1 and 8)
Franz Rosenzweig is the most influential thinker of this century and, probably, the next. His theology deserves 'unpacking' and careful study as a way of defining our own Judaism. We'll read excerpts from his writings and other relevant texts, in an effort to clarify our own ideas.

What Makes a Short Story Jewish?
Adam Sol
Wednesdays at 7:30 p.m.
(Oct. 27, Nov. 3, 10, 17, 24 and Dec. 1)
This course will encourage us to examine what we mean when we talk about Jewish literature. Is a story that has no recognizable Jewish content, but is by a Jewish writer, such as J.D. Salinger, Jewish literature? Or how about a story by Tadeusz Borowski, a non-Jewish survivor of the Holocaust? We'll also look at an essay or two, which will help lead us into our discussion. Our focus every week, however, will be on short stories that will force us to confront our assumptions about what Jewish Literature is and should be.

Haftarah Cantillation
Randi Garfinkel
Tuesdays at 7:30 p.m.
(Oct. 5, 12, 19, 26, Nov. 2, 9, 16, Dec. 7 and 14)
In this course, you'll learn the history of the cantillation system and the skills to chant Haftarah. This course is ideal for a recent Bar/Bat Mitzvah (adult or teen), or anyone who's interested in extending his or her skills.

Other Fall Lectures

Thurs., Oct. 14 at 7:30 p.m.
Matthew Teitelbaum, Director, Art Gallery of Ontario
Reaching Audiences: Charlotte Salomon, Paintings and Exhibitions that Matter (slide lecture)

Tues., Oct. 19 at 8 p.m.
Mark Rosenblum
Political Director, American Friends of Peace Now
Barak and the Pursuit of Peace: A Current Analysis

Tues., Nov. 2 at 8 p.m.
Professor Michael Marrus
Dean of Graduate Studies, University of Toronto
The Holocaust:
What was Known at the Time? By Whom? When?
Holocaust Education Week Lecture

Tues., Nov. 16 at 7:30 p.m.
Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut
Book Launch:
The Price and Privilege of Growing Old
What is it that most people want to become, but nobody wants to be? In this uplifting new book, Rabbi Plaut ruminates 'from the inside' on a lifetime's perspective of being old, and confronting society's often-negative views, as well as one's own mortality.

Thurs., Nov. 18 at 7:30 p.m.
Harry Rasky

Importance of volunteerism stressed by Todres

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Volunteerism keeps people from falling prey to the sin of indifference says the president of Baycrest Foundation.

"The opposite of love is indifference and the opposite of life is indifference; we must never allow ourselves to be indifferent or view the world with indifference," Elaine Todres said at the recent opening meeting of National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto Section.

Todres, former deputy minister in five government departments and assistant deputy minister of the Ontario Women's Directorate, as well as an activist in the Jewish community, said that although many of her professional positions had been in mainly non-Jewish environments, "I chose to be visibly Jewish and raise my children in a Jewish home surrounded by Jewish history."

When she first moved with her husband to Toronto from Winnipeg, she called United Jewish Appeal and offered her time, she said.

"A group of women got together, and formed a business and professional network. We developed a group of leaders, and made plausible, important steps in what was then a male-based power structure."

She has witnessed in organizations, Todres said, that women develop skills such as chairing meetings, planning programs, organizing other volunteers, and writing and delivering speeches. "Volunteering in organizations definitely makes a difference in women. I can see their maturation as they get involved."

When working for Ian Scott, former attorney general of Ontario, Todres, the first female deputy minister in Ontario, said a group of six Orthodox feminists came to see her to talk about the problem of agunot.

"Fourteen years ago we didn't talk about agunot because at that time, no Jewish issues were identified. How is it that our voices were so stilled that we were not identifying such fierce issues?"

After being told that Ontario believes in the separation of church and state, Todres said, and that there was a beit din that could handle the issue, "these women took matters [in their own hands] and lobbied the legislature. One woman sat daily – with her knitting – at the legislative hearings."

These women radicalized her commitment to make Jewish women's issues "all of our issues," Todres said.

Working at Baycrest was one of the results of her choice to become even more involved in the Jewish community, she said.

"Baycrest is the only place that I can speak Yiddish in the morning and meet with a group of bankers in the afternoon. I feel comfortable there; it is a wonderful way to meld the various compartments of my life."

Women who choose to become involved in an organization, she said, can do anything from stuffing envelopes to developing new programs. "Each choice is important to the woman and to the community.

"I always get inspired by evenings such as this because I see women who are struggling with the same issues, juggling the same balls. I hope that we each make positive, life affirming choices that inspire continuity. Your great-granddaughters will carry on the same commitments as you do."

Todres encouraged women not to sit around and let events unfold. "Choosing to act is better than not acting. Choosing to be involved is better than being distant."

Orthodox Caucus launched

Tradburks, Dr. Aaron Jesin, Jerry Tollinsky, Aaron Weinstock and Kurt Rothschild.

The Toronto Torah Ethics Project is the biggest project the Orthodox Caucus has undertaken, Rabbi Kelman said. "It is the first one where we are trying to get the whole community involved."

The project chosen for Toronto is Kevod HaBeriyot, sensitivity to the needs and feelings of others. For three weeks, starting on Shabbat, Oct. 9, there will be projects, programs, guest speakers, sermons, study evenings and discussions in schools, shuls, private homes, organizations and youth groups.

The inaugural speaker will be Rabbi Jacob Schacter, spiritual leader of Manhattan's Jewish Centre and an expert on Halachah and ethics. The event will be held Oct. 10 at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz in Downsview.

Discussion guides, reading lists and other material geared to different age groups are being distributed throughout the community. Topics include a schoolmate who wants to join a game but causes his team to lose, a friend with bad taste in clothes, a non-observant family that moves in next door to an observant one, and a man who refuses to give his wife a get.

One of the sources cited in the Kevod HaBeriyot material is a quote from Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, which probably sums up the Orthodox Caucus:

"I may attack a certain point of view which I consider false, but I will never attack a person who preaches it…Such a relation is in accord with the concept of kevod haberiyot, for 'beloved is man for he is created in the image of God.'"

For information on the Kevod HaBeriyot Torah Ethics Project or the Orthodox Caucus generally, contact Rabbi Jay or Ilana Kelman, 416-633-5406, or the Orthodox Caucus Web site, www.orthodoxcaucus.org.

Internet Bible study project launched

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism project that kicks off this Sunday will have Jews studying the Bible in bite-size – or, in many cases, byte-size – chunks.

The Perek Yomi program, which has an Internet component, is the brainchild of Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive vice-president of the New-York based umbrella organization.

Since the project was announced over the High Holy Days, United Synagogue has received inquiries from Canadians in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal, as well as many from the United States, and a "smidgen" from Israel and South America, according to Morton Siegel, senior vice-president of United Synagogue of America.

One of the synagogues actively involved in the program is Beth Tzedec Congregation, the largest Conservative congregation in North America.

"We want to enable people to study, learn and grow, at their timetable," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader.

"We're trying to enable people to create the possibility of studying, without necessarily coming into the synagogue. It's not that we don't want them to come in, but we recognize that given people's schedules, they're sometimes limited."

The Perek Yomi program at Beth Tzedec has three components: a link from the synagogue's Web site (www.beth-tzedec.org) to United Synagogue's Perek Yomi site (www.uscj.org/perekyomi), which offers questions, listserves, chat rooms and mentors), a paper version of weekly questions relevant to each daily portion, and the availability of synagogue clergy as resource people.

Particularly for people who are already online, the program provides a new opportunity, said the rabbi. It shouldn't take more than 10 to 15 minutes a day, he added.

By studying a chapter a day, participants can read the complete Tanach – the five books of the Torah as well as the Prophets and the Writings – in 2½ years. The program begins on Simchat Torah with the Book of Joshua.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl believes that Bible study can be a unifying force in the Jewish community. "[It] may be one of the important ways that, as Jews, we can bridge some of our differences, instead of focusing on areas where we have disagreements," he said.

People today are looking to spiritual sources to help them deal with rapid social, economic and technological changes, the rabbi believes.

"As the 20th century closes, people see that we have made tremendous technological and scientific progress, but they don't necessarily see the same kind of moral advancement."

Pride of Israel joins growing number of study programs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is there some kind of trend towards Bible study? Absolutely, says Rabbi Robert Rhodes, spiritual leader of the Pride of Israel Synagogue.

While a number of Canadian Conservative congregations are gearing up for the post-holiday launch of United Synagogue's Perek Yomi program, the Pride of Israel recently announced its own daily study program (Tanach Yomi), in affiliation with the religious Zionist organization AMIT (Americans for Israel and Torah).

The program was launched at AMIT's national convention in Ellenville, N.Y., in July. Participants will receive a book of daily study guides. Registration, through the AMIT New York office, is $36 US.

Neither Rabbi Rhodes nor the congregation, which is traditional Conservative in practice, is affiliated with AMIT.

The rabbi read about the program in the New York Jewish newspaper, the Forward, and thought it sounded like a good idea.

Since he joined the synagogue in August, he has received a number of requests for adult education, and more than a dozen congregants have expressed an interest in the AMIT program, he said last week.

Participants will study daily on their own, and the rabbi will lead a weekly study session, beginning after the holidays.

The program at Pride of Israel begins with the Book of Genesis.

Other adult education initiatives being instituted by Rabbi Rhodes include a Read Hebrew Canada program, and Shabbat afternoon study sessions on the laws of mourning – "not a happy subject but surprisingly interesting, and it has practical value," said the rabbi.

Throughout the western world, said Rabbi Rhodes, more people are becoming more interested in – and have more access to information about – spirituality. "It's not a phenomenon unique to Jews and Judaism."

People who wouldn't necessarily buy a book of commentary, he said, would go to a Web site and read about the weekly Torah portion.

Further information about Tanach Yomi is available from the Pride of Israel Web site at www.thepride.org.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

Are you an early morning person? Do you consider yourself to be a team leader? If yes, a volunteer is urgently needed on Wednesday mornings for Circle of Care's Kosher Meals on Wheels Program. Work together with another volunteer and staff to co-ordinate volunteer drivers and organize the Wednesday morning meal delivery. Contact Arnold or Judy at 635-2860.

If you are a caring person who would like to make a difference, have four hours a week to volunteer, and are interested in Hospice Palliative Care, the Dorothy Ley Hospice would like to meet you. For more information about volunteering and the October training program, call 626-0116.

Baycrest Centre is looking for volunteers with good interpersonal and interviewing skills who can make a half-day weekly commitment to telephone seniors in the community or their caregivers to provide support. In addition to English, a second language of Yiddish, Russian, French, Hungarian or Polish would be an asset. Training and supervision provided. Call Mindy Goodman, 785-2500, ext. 2250.

Some of the most obvious mitzvot are some of the hardest to keep.

Imagine if the Torah said nothing about moral behavior. Would you suddenly become a liar, a thief, an opportunist?

Then why, with Torah and halacha's explicit demands for moral excellence, do so many flounder in this crucial area?

To be observant, you cannot disregard interpersonal mitzvot.

If you meticulously cover your challot on Friday night but are inconsistent about your sensitivity to your family and friends, are you really a Torah observant Jew?

Yet in violation of Torah, too many in our community, while continuing to achieve unprecedented heights in Torah study and observance of many mitzvot, fail in their personal relationships.

The problem is not that Orthodox Jews are any less ethical than the non-Orthodox. In fact, many individual and group assistance projects within the Orthodox community are the pride of the entire Jewish community. What's crucial is that Torah sets a high standard for all of us to follow and that we cannot deny any shortcomings within our community. In ceremony. In ritual. And in ethics.

It is painful to hear about committed Jews who say and do the wrong things, cheat or get involved in shameful scandals. These Jews ignore not only the spirit of the Torah we hold so dear, but the halachot that should be our guide. A guide not just to our communities and our organizations but to individual family members, business people and citizens as well.

The Torah demands a balance. It does not allow our achievements in the arena of ceremonial and ritual mitzvot to cover up failures in the arena of interpersonal mitzvot.

The Orthodox Caucus.
A catalyst for self-improvement.

Through our S. Daniel Abraham and Ira L. Rennert Torah Ethics Project, we have activated a program designed for self-improvement.

Working as a catalyst with the major institutions of our communities, its synagogues and day schools, its media and its homes, we are creating programs and materials that encourage the study of a number of key halachic ethical issues, neighborhood by neighborhood, family by family, one theme at a time.

Geneivat Da'at. Kevod Ha-Beriyot. Chillul Hashem. Ahavat Yisrael. Shalom Bayit. Dina D'malchuta.

Will this work?

Our single-minded approach has already been tested in many communities. To the members of these communities, in yeshivot, from synagogue pulpits and at thousands of Shabbat tables, ethical behavior has taken on a new urgency. As adherents of halacha and responsible members of society.

Now leading local rabbis, educators and lay leaders bring this exciting project to Toronto as well, starting in the coming weeks with Kevod Ha-Beriyot ("Sensitivity").

If we are not the "light unto the nations" we are meant to be, it is not because of imperfections in halacha. It is because of imperfections in ourselves.

Relationships between Jew and Jew, Jew and non-Jew, and the dignity we must afford men and women alike, are all covered in detail in our rich halachic, aggadic and mussar literature, as well as in the biographies of the leading personalities of every generation.

Derech Eretz, Anivut, Gemilut Chasadim, and Areivut must be taught and lived as equals to Hilchot Shabbat, Talmud Torah, Eruv and Nidah. Torah, after all, was given to us in its entirety at Sinai. We dare not pick and choose our halachic commitments.

A day will come when turning your back on a shady business deal, working through a problem with your spouse and accurately reporting your income to the tax authorities will become indispensible to the definition of "observant".

On that day, our goal will have been achieved.

Emunah launches crisis centre for Israeli children

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Emunah Women of Canada is spearheading the construction of a crisis centre in Israel for children who – in increasing numbers – have to be taken away from their families because they are being abused or facing danger at home.

The $1-million (US) centre being built at the request of Israel's Welfare Department is set to open by Chanukah. It will be located at one of Emunah's four Israeli institutions for needy children, and will be Israel's first crisis centre to also accommodate children with disabilities and those from Orthodox backgrounds.

According to Canadian Emunah executive vice-president Roslyn Schneidman, the centre is a response to an increased need in the Jewish state to find safe places for children whose family situation necessitates their leaving right away.

Israel has only two other crisis centres for children, both of which are run by the state, Schneidman said.

"There is a dire need," she said. "It's the unfortunate reality."

According to the organization, the centre "will be open 24 hours a day to take in children who have to be immediately removed from their homes due to the effects of extreme abuse, poverty, parental drug abuse or mental illness. The crisis centre will save children."

The centre will be a two-storey separate structure at the Neve Michael Children's Village in Pardes-Chana north of Netanya, one of Emunah's homes for underprivileged children.

Founded in 1942 by Emunah and by Youth Aliyah as a place to house European refugee children smuggled to Israel via Iran and Provides 'special attention a religious child would need'

Japan, the home was originally called Beit Hayeled.

In an Orthodox setting, Neve Michael now accommodates close to 300 children from needy and/or troubled families, and provides educational facilities and a warm and nurturing home-like environment.

Children are placed at Neve Michael by Israel's Department of Social Welfare and by Youth Aliyah, and sometimes through a court order. Virtually all Neve Michael "graduates," Schneidman said, go on to live productive and successful lives after they leave.

She said the advantage of the crisis centre is that there will finally be a place that provides "the special attention a religious child would need."

Schneidman emphasized, however, that the centre, like the village, will be non-sectarian, accepting children from all cultural and religious backgrounds.

It is also not a "shelter," she said, which would house children only on a very temporary basis.

The centre will have15 beds, with a minimum stay of three months expected. Its facilities will include two classrooms, an observation room, an evaluation room, a playroom, a playground, a counselling room for parents, and rooms for a psychologist, social worker, doctor and nurse.

Schneidman anticipated that many of the children will later integrate into the village itself, which is structured with "family units" with "parents" for groups of about a dozen children.

Neve Michael also has an elementary school and facilities to help educate children with learning disabilities or those who are intellectually impaired.

Schneidman said although Neve Michael receives Israeli government funding, Emunah Women of Canada is alone taking on the crisis centre's fundraising outside Israel.

A cocktail reception will be held Oct. 19, 6 p.m., at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue, with guest speaker Monica Berger, wife of former Canadian ambassador to Israel David Berger.

Another function will take place in Toronto Nov. 21, and the campaign will have events in other Canadian cities, including Ottawa and Windsor.

"These children were lost before," said Schneidman. "Now we hope they'll be saved."

CIC chair sees amicable resolution to peace talks

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As the peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians proceed, the shape of public opinion in Canada and the rest of the world will become increasingly important, according to Joe Wilder, the newly installed national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

Joe Wilder

"It is very important that Canadian Jewry understand the issues and help explain them to their fellow citizens and legislators," Wilder told The CJN in a recent interview.

"To that end, the Canada-Israel Committee has created a new initiative – a grass-roots outreach program across the country to educate our Jewish communities about the situation, he said.

"We are concerned that our younger people do not have the same visceral feeling about Israel as there was during previous crises. We want to try to stimulate that interest and reconnect our people with their roots and the State of Israel."

Wilder, a prominent Winnipeg lawyer, has been a major player on the Canadian Jewish stage for the past 25 years. He has been involved in the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and Canadian Jewish Congress.

The CIC was formed in the late 1960s in the aftermath of the 1967 Six-Day War. Wilder became involved with the committee as a representative of Congress, replacing Torontonian Brian Morris as CIC chair in August.

Wilder pointed out that Canada, in recent years, has developed a much higher international profile and has more influence than it did in earlier years. On a recent CIC-related visit to Israel, Wilder said he noticed a huge change in the way Israelis regard Canada and Canadian Jewry.

"The last prime minister of Israel was quoted as saying that Canada was not on his radar screen," Wilder recounted. "We are now. We found that Israelis understand that we are distinct from Americans."

Wilder and his fellow CIC members, as well as Congress and B'nai Brith delegates, met with several of the new Israeli cabinet ministers, a number of other government and business people and staff from the Canadian Embassy. The CIC chair described the discussions as informative, constructive and helpful.

One of the ministers with whom the Canadians met was Rabbi Michael Melchior, who heads the new ministry of relations with the Diaspora.

Wilder said he was impressed with the tremendous change in Israeli attitudes to their cousins in the Diaspora.

"Rabbi Melchior talked about the importance of the rest of world Jewry to Israel," Wilder recalled. "A number of ministers spoke of their concern for Jews, not only in disadvantaged countries, but all over the world.

"While our younger people do not seem to be as connected to Israel as in the past, Israelis, who used to be more inward-looking, are showing greater concern with Jews elsewhere."

While the change in government in Israel has made the work of advocacy groups such as the CIC much easier, Wilder cautioned that there is a danger that expectations are so high that they will be difficult to fulfil.

"The honeymoon period will be short," he said, "but deals take more time to be consummated. The issues are enormously complex ... Part of our job now will be to explain that the parties in the peace negotiations [require] the necessary time to reach a settlement free of external pressure."

While Canada and Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy are generally supportive of Israel, Wilder noted that the CIC is not always happy with the way Canada votes at the UN.

For instance, he cited a vote last February on a resolution sponsored by 19 states which castigated Israel "with incendiary language." The resolution called for the reconvening of the Geneva Convention to judge Israel's conduct in the occupied territories.

"Canada voted in favor," Wilder said. "The United States cast the only dissenting vote. We met with our foreign [affairs] minister in Ottawa en masse to suggest that the Geneva meeting was not helpful to the peace process.

"It goes against the spirit of the Wye accords where both sides agreed to refrain from unilateral action. It may be coincidental, but Canada didn't attend the [Geneva] meeting. The session was adjourned indefinitely."

Wilder said he foresees an amicable resolution in the peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

He sees the buildup of nuclear arms by Iran and Iraq as the major problem in Middle Eastern foreign affairs, he said. "There is a grave fear that both Iran and Iraq may have nuclear weapons within a few years."

Visual arts series set

TORONTO — Jewish Visual Culture, a six-part lecture series on Jewish art, gets under way Oct. 5 at the Koffler Centre of the Arts (4588 Bathurst St.).

Presenters will be Sylvia Ptak and Cyril Reade, who have been collaborating on projects dealing with Jewish identity and visual culture since 1996.

The six slide lectures will examine Jewish visual culture through various thematic viewpoints, including Jewish art of the 19th century; Nazi-proscribed degenerate art; the Jewish influence on art in the 1950s in the United States; memorialization through artworks; gender-based art practices; and the geographical, political and spiritual aspects of work by contemporary Jewish artists.

Ptak, a visual artist and educator, recently produced a slide resource of Holocaust-related work by Canadian artists for the York Region Board of Education to support its Holocaust curriculum unit.

The lectures will take place Oct. 5 and 19; Nov. 2, 16 and 30; and Dec. 14, all from 7 to 9 p.m.

Tickets prices and other details are available from the Koffler Centre, 636-1880, ext. 270.

Jewish candidates defeated in Manitoba

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — All three Jewish candidates running in last week's provincial election in Manitoba were defeated, but for Lawrie Cherniack, the battle is not yet over.

The Winnipeg lawyer was the NDP standard-bearer in a traditionally strong Conservative riding in south Winnipeg. Nonetheless, he came within 19 votes of pulling off a major upset. At press time, the hospital and prison votes were still to be counted, and with a margin of victory that narrow, there will be an automatic recount.

"There will be a recount, but I am not hopeful," he said. "I don't expect to win it. I am happy that my party won the election."

Cherniack has deep socialist roots. His grandparents, the late Alter and Fanya Cherniack, were founders of the I.L. Peretz Folk School and prominent leaders in Winnipeg's left wing Yiddishist movement in the 1920s and 1930s. Alter Cherniack was among the founders of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Lawrie Cherniack's father, Saul, was a cabinet minister in the first NDP government elected in Manitoba and served in the the cabinet during both of Ed Schreyer's terms in office (1969-1977).

Lawrie Cherniack himself was a Winnipeg city councillor at one point and a member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council. This was his first run for office provincially.

For Liberal candidates Rochelle Zimberg and Michael Lazar, their campaigns were impossible missions from the beginning. Lazar, a prominent younger member of Winnipeg's Jewish community, ran in the north Winnipeg riding of Kildonan, where the majority of the north Winnipeg Jewish community resides.

While it was expected that Lazar would at least finish a strong second, he actually finished well back in third place, more than a thousand votes behind the second place Conservative candidate and 5,000 shy of the incumbent NDP MLA.

"The results were disappointing," said Lazar who has been a member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council since 1989, "but percentage-wise my results were in line with the Liberal vote province wide. My staff and volunteers worked hard and we learned a lot. My strong feeling is that the people wanted to get rid of the Conservatives and felt that the best way to do it was to vote NDP."

Zimberg was the Liberals' sacrificial lamb in Tuxedo, the riding held by outgoing Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon. Like Lazar, Zimberg, the former longtime executive director of the Manitoba Association of Urban Municipalities, finished a distant third.

The collapse of the Liberals led to the election of the New Democratic Party, led by Gary Doer, bringing to an end the 11-year administration of Gary Filmon. The final count was 31 seats for the NDP, 25 for the Conservatives and one for the Liberals (Liberal leader Dr. Jon Gerrard in the heavily Jewish River Heights riding).

Filmon was a good friend to the Jewish community throughout his tenure. He grew up in the largely Jewish North End. His father spoke Yiddish and an aunt married a Jewish man and converted to Judaism.

During his time in office, he supported the construction of a Holocaust Memorial on the Legislature grounds, and his government was a major contributor toward construction of the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

He and his wife, Janice, were instrumental in initiating the flow of Argentine Jewish families to Winnipeg in the last couple of years. In recognition of his friendship, both B'nai Brith and the JNF have honored Gary Filmon.

Volunteer bureau launched in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's major Jewish communal organizations have joined together to form a central volunteer bureau for the Jewish community.

Hours to Share is a culmination of two years of discussions between the participating organizations which include the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, the Gray Academy of Jewish Education, the Rady Jewish Community Centre, the Jewish Heritage Centre, the Jewish Child and Family Service and the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre. All these organizations are housed at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, and the Sharon Home.

"We began working on this when the Asper Jewish Community Campus opened in September, 1997," says Hours to Share co-ordinator Maurene Cohen of the Jewish Child and Family Service.

"At the Jewish Child and Family Service, we have over 200 volunteers," Cohen says. "We were getting requests from these other organizations and agencies for volunteers but we were at capacity. We couldn't accommodate any more."

On behalf of all the organizations involved, the Jewish Child and Family Service applied for and received a grant from the Winnipeg Foundation to study the feasibility of a joint volunteer bureau. "Now we have implemented the bureau," Cohen says.

To announce the formation of the new volunteer bureau, the cooperating organizations blanketed the synagogues with flyers on Rosh Hashanah.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Don't say you weren't warned! We predicted trench warfare amongst Liberals in the battle to win the nominations in two of the safest Liberal ridings in the country.

In Toronto, Judy Sgro defeated Sergio Marchi's former assistant, Peter Vecchiarelli. Vecchiarelli was the choice candidate of the Liberal party brass, but following a less than pleasant campaign and surprising strength from a third candidate, Jesse Randhawa (himself a longstanding Liberal), Sgro came up the middle. In effect, her victory represents a "nose-thumbing" at the party, a sort of reclaiming of the Liberal party for Main Street.

Montreal's experience is a little more dramatic, but may result in an even harsher wake-up call for the Liberal establishment. It also hits a little closer to the Jewish community, since Mount Royal still has the largest Jewish population of any riding in the country.

Municipal politician, Saulie Zajdel has had his eyes set on the nomination. He had expressed keen interest in it before, but was persuaded to defer to Sheila Finestone who decided to run one more time. It seemed his time had finally arrived. He had a proven track record as a city councillor, an impressive network of support and, most of all, a burning ambition to become an MP.

He started this nomination race so far out in front that Eric Maldof resisted the temptation to run. But as the date for closing out nominations drew near, a white knight appeared in the form of Prof. Irwin Cotler.

Suddenly, Zajdel was approached by the "party" to withdraw his name from the race in favor of Cotler. Seeing the writing on the wall, and being an astute politician, Zajdel withdrew (for the second time) and put his support behind Cotler.

However, the Liberal party Powers That Be (PTBs) could not yet celebrate. There were too many riding association memberships floating around, not to mention a third candidate poised to pull a "Sgro." So more pressure had to be brought to bear, and presto! the field was cleared and Cotler was acclaimed.

On the riding level, however, this may prove to be a pyrrhic victory. How long do the PTBs think earnest Canadians will invest of themselves in an exercise that ignores democratic principles and is contemptuous of their right to choose a candidate?

We're betting – not long at all.

Cotler to carry Liberal banner in Mount Royal

the McGill-based centre he founded. Lately, he has been involved with the effort to establish a permanent international criminal court. He also wants to continue teaching at McGill, where he has been a professor for 27 years, if a reduced schedule can be worked out.

As a constitutional law expert, Cotler thinks he can make a contribution to the national unity debate. "Federalism is a morally compelling ideal, which I don't think is being articulated properly. It's imperfect, but internationally it is seen as an effective model, something I don't think we understand or appreciate."

Cotler rejects the bookkeeping approach to federalism, that is, focusing on its fiscal benefits or drawbacks. "Federalism is a system of values, beliefs and principles – about social justice, sharing of power, protecting the individual by limiting the state's authority – which should be asserted.

"In the battle of ideas, federalism will win out over secession."

Cotler has not been associated in the public's mind with Quebec's language issue, and he is not now donning the mantle of anglophone rights defender in Ottawa.

"I see language as part of the larger issue of minority rights... As representative of Mount Royal, I should reflect the multicultural mosaic, which includes the promotion and protection of minorities. Language is part of the larger concerns of minorities," he said.

Although he is better known for his activities on the international stage, Cotler said his human rights work began at the local level, working in anti-poverty projects, including founding the legal aid clinic in Pointe St. Charles 30 years ago.

Cotler, a lifelong resident of the riding, said that until a few days before Yom Kippur he had no intention of or interest in running for the seat vacated when Sheila Finestone, Mount Royal's MP for 15 years, was appointed to the Senate Aug. 11.

He was in Israel at the time for his grandson's brit milah, and didn't even know Finestone had resigned until his return at the beginning of September. Later that month, Cotler returned to Israel for the pidyon haben.

"When I came back, the pressure began and built to a crescendo."

But, he was torn, he said. "I didn't feel good about it."

So, just before Yom Kippur, he turned to his spiritual mentor, 80-year-old Herzl Fishman in Jerusalem, an ethical philosopher.

"He said, 'You have no choice. Your responsibility is to answer the call of those who believe in you. You must run.'"

"I thought it through during Yom Kippur and right after Neilah, made my decision. The next morning I filed my papers."

At the same time, Saulie Zajdel, 43, a Montreal executive committee and Lubavitch community member, generally seen as the front runner, withdrew his candidacy and declared his support for Cotler. He had entered the race only five days earlier.

Cotler, he stated, "is a candidate of national and international stature. His record as an advocate for the poor and the rights of women, minorities and the oppressed speaks for itself. I am confident that Irwin will be a strong and effective voice in Ottawa for the concerns of Mount Royal, and will bring much needed intellectual rigor and passion to Parliament. We need people like Irwin Cotler in public life."

Shortly after, lawyer David Lisbona, 30, also bowed out, giving his support to Cotler. "Irwin has a stellar reputation... It's an honor just to have him as my MP."

The last hold out, lawyer Anthony Housefather, 29, a militant English rights and Canadian unity campaigner, dropped out Wednesday night.

"There was tremendous pressure, more from the community than the party. The party played by the rules. They didn't say you're out or we won't sign your papers," his aide Steve Pinkus said.

Housefather withdrew reluctantly, however, because he had signed up close to 900 members.

"It was a realistic assessment. A man of Cotler's worldwide stature and the considerable resources he could mobilize were more than we could go up against," Housefather said.

Within three days, Cotler's team had 2,000 members signed up.

This summer, I was fortunate to be a participant in a special science program for pre-university students, the Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence International Summer Science Program.

As I boarded the airplane in July for Israel and a month's visit to the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, I realized I was about to embark on a journey that would change my life.

Five weeks later, I returned to Toronto, and realized how right I was.

The Weizmann Institute, named after the great Jewish scientist and first president of Israel, Chaim Weizmann, began this program in order to fulfil Weizmann's dream of exposing young minds, gifted in the sciences, to the wonders of science and Israel.

It provides participants a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to meet peers from around the world, enjoy the equipment and facilities of the renowned Weizmann Institute, and benefit from the experience of engaging professors and researchers, in a beautiful campus setting.

The program, which this year included six Canadian students from across the country, is co-ordinated by the staff of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute. Dr. Louis Siminovitch, one of Canada's leading scientists, conducted the applicant interviews.

Sixty-six students assembled from around the world (Argentina, Canada, Columbia, England, Germany, Holland, Israel, Mexico, Russia, Serbia, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay and the United States) to conduct research in the fields of biology, chemistry, mathematics and physics.

The projects undertaken by the students included cloning proteins, genetic engineering, optical data processing, and combinatorial circuit complexity with cryptographic applications.

Opinion

My project involved the comparative study of proteins by electrophoretic analysis. This research helped to significantly increase my knowledge of laboratory equipment and procedures.

I enjoyed the company of interesting, like-minded, pre-university teenagers from different religious, ethnic, cultural and national backgrounds. In fact, I learned more about people than I did about science.

Three-quarters of the participants were not Jewish, which for me enhanced the quality of the program from a cultural perspective.

The Jewish students benefited from an assorted group, while the non-Jews were provided with an environment where they could learn about the history and traditions of the Jewish people and the land of Israel.

It is not difficult to appreciate why students are motivated to return. The setting is extremely conducive to a positive learning environment; the lush grounds of the Institute create a relaxed, comfortable atmosphere.

Several post-doctoral students served as counsellors to our group and arranged excursions both within and outside the facility. I particularly enjoyed visiting the Koffler Particle Accelerator.

Those directing the students did an outstanding job. Each pair of young scientists was instructed and assisted by a private mentor, a scientist who was conducting post-doctoral research at the Weizmann Institute.

A typical day began in the lab, where participants diligently worked on their projects and prepared for seminars. This continued until lunch, when everyone met together in the cafeteria to informally discuss their work and findings, as well as to socialize. On returning to the lab, the students resumed their research tasks.

After a long day of work, free time before dinner gave the teens an opportunity to go into town, enjoy a luxurious swim in the Institute's magnificent pool, or just catch up on e-mail in the computer lab.

Following dinner, more free time allowed students to play cards, musical instruments, and ping-pong – essentially, to relax. Occasionally, evening programs were co-ordinated, ranging from parties to sports.

Weekend trips were organized to expose students to different aspects of Israel. We toured Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, the Galilee, Eilat, and Ein Gedi.

All the students got along very well – in fact, the majority of the participants maintain contact through the Internet. One boy from Switzerland established a Web site which you may visit at issi99@onelist.com.

I have taken away so much from this outstanding program: skills, friends, and memories which will last me a lifetime. I was enriched by learning a great deal about science, through lectures and practical application. I also learned a great deal about myself.

I suppose I was right when, as I boarded the plane, I knew that I was never going to be the same.

The Iraqi Jews of Toronto

By JERRY GLADMAN
Special to The CJN

There are few communities in Toronto – anywhere, for that matter – that are as self-contained, successful and unique as the tiny Iraqi Jewish stronghold here.

Their ranks (probably no more than 1,000) bulge with the upper echelons of professionals. Most are highly educated, particularly the younger generation.

They look after their own, stubbornly maintaining their cultural and religious traditions. And even though they avoid involvement in politics, they contribute to the overall society in many ways.

"We are an independent community and people," says Asad Muallin, a veterinarian consultant who fled Iraq in 1965 and eventually settled here.

"Our community is well-educated and mostly professionals. We are the cream of the crop. We are very demanding on our children and, in nature, very competitive. In short, we like to be successful."

Asad Muallin

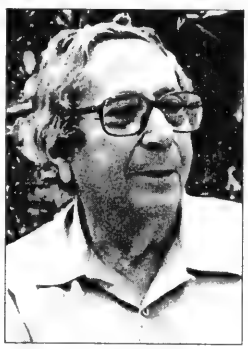
Not that other communities don't. But their small numbers and their history account for their uniqueness.

For one thing, Iraqi Jews were once among the most prosperous and influential populations in the Middle East. Unlike Europe's Jews, they weren't swept up in the horrors of the Holocaust, although they were ultimately persecuted before fleeing Iraq in the '50s.

And once they did reach our shores, the new immigrants were able to manage without assistance from any organization or association geared to helping new immigrants.

The immigrants clung to the philosophy that an effective system of Jewish Iraqi tradition is crucial to maintaining Babylonian Jewish consciousness, wherever they are.

"You have to understand that the Iraqi Jews weren't persecuted the same as the Jews in Europe," says Sasson Mayer, a 73-year-old retired developer who has been living in Toronto for more than 30 years. "For a long time we really had no reason to leave. We more or less controlled the economy."



Naim Dallal

They were Iraq's main traders, goldsmiths and money-changers, and comprised the bulk of government employees. They had 30 private schools in Baghdad alone, and with their departure, Iraq lost many of its elite engineers, doctors, musicians and artisans.

Some estimates put the Iraqi Jewish population at 350,000 before their major exodus to Israel in the early '50s. Now, it's believed there are less than 100 Jews in the entire country. Some 30 synagogues lay in ruins or were deserted. Only one is still open – and that will probably soon join the others.

Meanwhile, while most other new Jewish immigrants sought to assimilate into the overall Jewish community here, the Iraqis purposely avoided it.

"I don't like the word assimilate," says Naim Dallal, 74, a dental surgeon, who was founder and president of the Iraqi Jewish Association (IJA) of Ontario.

"Our community has not really changed here. We try to hang on to our traditions, which are different. We try to keep the community as it is. It hasn't been hard."

But he adds that their desire to keep together hasn't prevented them from contributing to the overall community.

"None of us went on welfare. We pay for our children's education. We are a very proud community that looks after its own... We have made solid contributions to society, including charitable donations."

But, he says, there is not much of a connection with other Jewish associations. "It just hasn't been necessary, although we have cultural meetings that are extended to the other groups."

Mind you, there were some who would have welcomed help from others when they first arrived, but were rebuffed.

"I was very disappointed that the Jewish groups didn't help when I came in 1975," says Ramzi Loya, 59, an accountant, who lived alone here in a basement apartment for seven months before his family was able to join him.

"It was very difficult. A friend from school in Iraq directed me where to go. Then, someone gave me an idea – to go through the list of companies in the YellowPages to find work.

"I was an accountant in the travel business in Iraq and found a travel company where I eventually worked for 11 years before upgrading myself.

"We are very happy here now," he adds. "It's a very successful community."

While a largely affluent society, the Iraqi Jews still don't have their own synagogue. For most of the past 20 years, they have rented accommodations for the High Holy Days and imported their own rabbi from Israel. They now have a contract with a shul for the next three years.

"There just aren't enough families to justify the cost of our own shul," says Dallal, whose wife, Renee, now heads the IJA.

Almost every family has an intriguing story about their lives in Iraq and their departure from a society that dates back to 7 BCE when King Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem and carried thousands of its inhabitants in chains to Babylon.

Under British rule beginning in 1917, the Jews fared well economically and many served in top government posts. But in 1941, the mufti-inspired, pro-Nazi coup of Rashid Ali sparked rioting and a pogrom in Baghdad that saw 180 Jews murdered.

The persecution reached its peak during the establishment of the State of Israel and the 1948 War of Independence. The government declared Jews enemies of the state and spies, and forced numerous restrictions upon them.

They were forbidden to sell their homes and cars, limited to the amounts they could withdraw from bank accounts, and were banished from private businesses. Their movements were restricted within the country and yet, they were forced to stay in Iraq.

The persecution escalated following Israel's success in the Six Day War. In 1968, when the Ba'ath party came to power through a military coup, the situation grew even worse as more Jews were arrested, tortured and murdered.

In 1969, nine innocent Jews falsely accused of spying for Israel were hanged and their bodies suspended in public squares. Several more hangings followed after trumped-up charges.

By then, however, the majority of Jews had fled Iraq; most in the early '50s, following the establishment of a special bill that allowed them to leave if they renounced their citizenships.

The majority fled to Israel while the remainder scattered throughout the world, including North America.

Finally, in response to international pressure, the Iraqi government allowed most of the remaining Jews to leave in the '70s.

Mayer, whose father was the principal of the only Jewish high school in Iraq, was involved in a Jewish underground group and even spent time in jail. When the government began closing in on the underground's activities and his life was endangered, he escaped to Israel.

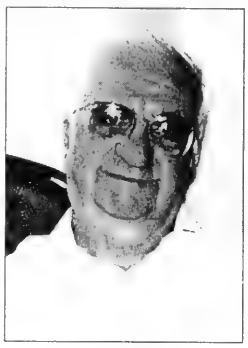
He fought in the '56 and '67 wars, married, raised a family and worked as an importer in the film business. Soon after, weary of the wars and economic strife, he moved his family to Toronto to join a brother and seek new opportunities.

"There were only a handful of Iraqi Jewish families when we arrived, but that's really when the community started. More families followed and I'd say there are now about 300 families. Half of them probably know each other from Iraq."

Dallal, who was among the early arrivals in 1959, has a fascinating background. He was one of the few Jews in the Middle East to serve in three different armies – as a dental student in Syria, in the Iraqi army during the War of Independence (all Jewish officers were dismissed under fabricated charges) and the Israeli army during the Suez War.

After leaving Iraq in 1952, he took his clan to London where he studied for a year, followed by six years in Israel. When the family joined his in-laws here in 1959, he attended the University of Toronto so he could work as a dental surgeon.

"We originally formed the IJA to keep families together. And we have succeeded. Our community has really not changed that much since I arrived, except it has grown."



Sasson Mayer

Although retired, Dallal, a member of the Canadian Jewish Congress' national committee, does volunteer work as a dentist in Israel one month each year.

Muallin left Iraq when he was a veterinarian student, immigrating secretly through the British Embassy in 1965. He first went to the U.S. but felt there were better opportunities here.

"I did everything on my own," says Muallin, now 57 and the father of three. "I had to start from zero. The family stayed in Iraq and the government confiscated their business, a large factory. My parents left for Israel in 1971. I visited them and met my future wife there."

Muallin says most of the Iraqi Jews that come to Toronto now are from Israel.

"We are a successful community, but we are not isolated. We feel we are part of the general Jewish community, but have traditions we prefer to keep our own."

Meanwhile, Loya said his family lost everything in the late '40s due to Iraqi government persecution.

"For a time it was very bad for us. There was no food and water. We had to live in huts. Things eventually improved, though, and I was able to study and become an accountant."

Ramzi Loya

When fired from his job following the Six Day War, he moved his wife and young child to Israel. They remained there for three years, but found life harsh. That's when he decided to move to Canada.

"The Iraqi Jewish community here helps one another. We stay together, although some have assimilated very well. We try to keep our traditions."

His wife, Norma, says that most of their friends are Iraqi Jews, but it's a different story with the next generation.

"Most of our children grew up in Canadian society and married Canadians. This is how they mix. But I don't believe the different traditions contradict each other. I think they compliment each other.

"Society changes, technology changes, but people continue to follow certain things from the past, simply because they are pleasant."

She smiled and added: "It's a good t[illegible]."

Toronto man joins Yad Vashem to pay tribute to Belgian saviors

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jacques Vogler put it simply and best when he turned to the children of his saviors, and said: "Thank you."

Small words for a huge gesture.

Last month, Vogler and his entire family – his wife, children, grandchildren, in-laws and nieces – travelled en masse to his native Belgium to help pay tribute to the family that rescued him during World War II.

At a moving ceremony at Israel's embassy in Brussels, two surviving members of the Malvaux family were designated Righteous Among the Nations, and presented with specially-struck medals. Their names will be installed at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, along with thousands of other Righteous Gentiles.

It was an emotional event, says Vogler, 69, an account executive at State of Israel Bonds' Toronto office. "We used a lot of Kleenex."

The honor was bestowed, posthumously, on René Malvaux and two of his children, André and Suzanne. A third child, Paul, was too young at the time to understand the gravity of the situation.

The Malvaux took in a young Vogler after Nazi Germany invaded Belgium in May, 1940.

Two years after the German invasion, Vogler, just 13, was on his way home from a boy scout meeting, when he saw his street being combed by Nazis, who were searching for Jews. He and his parents hid in the attic and avoided deportation.

The boy's parents paid a family to take him in. After another near capture, this time at a summer camp, Vogler was shunted to a sympathetic Roman Catholic priest, Abbé André, who was hiding about 25 Jewish children in a parish house in the town of Namur, about an hour's drive from Brussels.

Vogler knew the Malvaux family because they cooked soup for the hidden children. In the meantime, Vogler's parents were in hiding in Brussels, and his brother Norbert was caught trying to escape into France. He later died while on a forced march to a concentration camp.

Following a visit to the parish house by the Gestapo, Vogler, after just a few months in hiding with the priest, jumped a fence, again evading capture. Alone and frightened, he made his way to the Malvaux household, and was taken in.

"They made me part of the family," Vogler recalls. "I had my own room, they clothed me, fed me. I went to school, and worked in the family store during Christmas."

Vogler had false papers identifying him as a Catholic. The Malvaux family explained that he was an underprivileged child they had taken in.

But all the Malvaux children knew Vogler was Jewish, as did the extended family. Had the Germans discovered the ruse, everyone, including the children, would have been executed on the spot.

Vogler stayed with the family until 1946. He came to Canada the following year on a program for Jewish war orphans. He kept up contacts in the ensuing years, visiting as often as he could. René Malvaux died in the 1960s, but his grandchildren and Vogler's children have since established friendships.

Of the 65,000 Jews who had remained in Belgium, roughly 40,000 perished, including Vogler's parents.

Vogler first suggested that the family be honored by Yad Vashem three years ago.

"I have had the gift of life," Vogler said at the ceremony. "I have had the chance to see my children grow…I have had the chance to have a life."

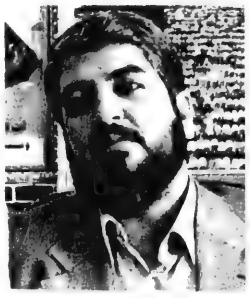
Jordan prepared for riots following Hamas' arrests

By DANNY RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Jordan's security forces were placed on high alert over the weekend to prepare for the possibility of riots in response to the arrest of Hamas leaders Khaled Meshal and Ibrahim Rosha, and the deportation of Moussa Abu Marzouk.



Khaled Meshal

King Abdullah of Jordan

Commentary

In the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Jordan's actions against Hamas are being watched. On Saturday, the Palestinian press carried pictures of a large Jordanian police force standing outside an Amman mosque, in case the worshippers tried to stage a demonstration as they came out of Friday prayers.

All has passed quietly so far, and the Jordanian public has not gotten overly excited about the arrests. The rest of the Arab world appears pleased at the Jordanian measures, as are Israel, the United States and the international community at large.

Even the Palestinians reacted with indifference. Palestinian sources in east Jerusalem say that for the past three weeks a debate raged among Hamas leadership in Jordan over the course of action for the group's leaders, who were on a visit to Iran when arrest warrants were issued against them in Amman.

It was not by chance that King Abdullah and his men launched their attack on Hamas when its leaders were abroad. The Jordanian authorities thus gave the three men a chance to avoid arrest by staying outside Jordan.

Among Hamas activists in Jordan and in the territories, there were those who warned that if the three men returned to Amman, it would be seen as a direct challenge to King Abdullah, a test as to whether he would really dare jail the leaders of the Palestinian fundamentalists.

The position adopted in the end was the more extreme one – requiring a confrontation with the authorities. The three returned to Amman and were greeted at the airport by their followers, who staged a demonstrative reception.

Hamas activists in the West Bank and Gaza Strip apparently did not approve this. Sheikh Ahmed Yassin and most of his men believe that Hamas should not now launch battles against the Jordanian authorities or Arafat's rule. They have several reasons for this, including a drop in their movement's popularity.

For example, many in the Palestinian public have recently criticized Hamas for the attempted bombing attacks in Haifa and Tiberias. They point to the fact that during the three years of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's term of office, there were almost no Hamas terrorist attacks, whereas now – after the formation of Barak's government and the renewal of the peace process – the attacks have been resumed.

They say this serves as a form of confirmation for the popular assertion that there is co-operation between the extremists on both sides – or in other words, that Hamas was pleased with Netanyahu.

But Hamas' problems stem from a wider background. For some time now, the position of Islamic fundamentalists in the Arab world seems to be weakening.

In Algeria, the fundamentalists are losing ground in the lengthy and vicious civil war. In Egypt, although earlier this month a Muslim fundamentalist tried to assassinate President Hosni Mubarak in Port Said, the Egyptian security authorities have largely managed to suppress Islamic terrorism.

In most Arab countries it is the moderate Islamic activists who are now gaining the upper hand. For example, Rashad Ghanushi of Tunisia, stated several days ago that it is the Arab leaders who need the extremists to justify their dictatorial rule.

"The only ones who stand to gain from the suspension of terrorism [on behalf of the extremists] are the Islamic movements themselves," Ghanushi declared.

But the weekly magazine of the east Jerusalem Al Quds newspaper argued this week that Islamic terrorism has not come to an end. Rather, it has simply moved far away from the Middle East, toward regions of the former Soviet Union.

At the center of this new wave of terrorism is the mysterious Hatab Jadib Abd al-Rahman, a Jordanian citizen of Saudi descent and a disciple of Osama Bin Laden.

Al-Rahman fought against the Russians in Afghanistan, moved on to help the fundamentalists in Egypt and Algeria, then fought in Bosnia and Chechnya and is now in Dagestan, from where he is directing the recent attacks and explosions in Russia.

Levy meets with Arab leaders

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Syria suffered a diplomatic blow when it failed to keep other Arab countries from participating in a multilateral meeting here with Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy last week.

The absence of Syria and Lebanon got more attention than the presence of 11 Arab countries and five countries from the Persian Gulf, some of which have no diplomatic relations with Israel. The Algerian envoy did not show up either.

Chief peace negotiator Dennis Ross said that Syria's absence was no surprise, but stressed that the United States has recently gone to great lengths to renew the talks between Israel and Syria and is convinced that the Syrians will be willing to co-operate.

Despite the Syrian no-show the meeting was a great success for Secretary of State Madeleine Albright who set it up. Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates and Yemen, none of which have diplomatic relations with Israel, sent delegates, as did Qatar.

UN sources told Ha'aretz that the Syrian foreign minister has been putting pressure on his Arab colleagues not to attend the meeting.

Syrian and Lebanese diplomats who were in New York for the UN assembly general meeting were working hard to convince officials from Arab countries and the Persian Gulf that attending a public meeting with the Israeli foreign minister would compromise Syria's starting point for reopening the talks with Israel.

After the meeting, Levy told reporters that the major significance of this meeting "was in that it expressed the commitment of the Arab world and the countries of the Persian Gulf and the Maghreb to the peace process."

Levy also said the fact that countries which had no diplomatic relations with Israel had sent delegates proved that "Israel was gaining recognition not only among its neighbors, but among countries like Saudi Arabia, Yemen and Arab countries in north Africa."

In his speech at the meeting, Levy reiterated the same view he has expressed in all his meetings in New York: Israel will not accept the double standard the Palestinians have been practising, namely, making agreements with Israel while simultaneously using every opportunity, especially in the UN, to promote anti-Israeli activities.

"The future of this region depends first and foremost on trust," he said. "We have to know that our partners keep their word."

New Black September feared

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A senior Jordanian source said last week that a police raid last month on Hamas offices in Amman uncovered evidence pointing to dangerous activity by the movement, threatening the kingdom's very stability.

The source, speaking with an Agence France Press reporter, claimed that "Hamas has invaded Islamist and opposition groups in Jordan in a manner reminiscent of the tragic events of the 1970 Black September."

In September 1970, King Hussein sent his army against Palestinian organizations after they declared the north of his kingdom a "liberated" territory and challenged his rule. The PLO was driven out of Jordan.

According to the source, the authorities have "thousands of documents, audio and video cassettes and CDs, constituting irrefutable evidence that some of the extremists in the Islamic ranks and opposition groups carried out missions for the Hamas."

According to the source, the Jordanian parliament was briefed on the situation "and delegates expressed concern over a repeat of Black September."

Last Wednesday, Jordan arrested the head of the Hamas political bureau, Khaled Meshal, and Ibrahim Rosha, the organization's representative in Jordan as they landed in Amman.

A member of the organization's political wing, Moussa Abu Marzouk, who holds Yemeni citizenship, was deported from Jordan several hours after arriving there from Tehran.

But a Hamas representative in Tehran, Abu Mohammed Mustapha, said last week that Abu Marzouk did not return to Iran. "He is not in Tehran, he is not in Iran and he is not coming here. I can guarantee that," Mustapha said.

Celebrating the High Holy Days in Riga

By BLAKE LAMBERT
Special to The CJN

RIGA, Latvia — When you grow up in Canada, you start to take some things for granted.

You will always have running water and electricity, barring certain circumstances, and assuming you pay your bills.

And if you walk into almost any synagogue from Victoria to Sydney, you will hear English.

However, if you are living in Riga, Latvia, during the High Holy Days, and you want to hear some English at the only synagogue, you are out of luck.

Welcome to the former Paris of the Baltic states, population perhaps 900,000, where Nazism and communism together violently choked the oxygen from a once-vibrant Jewish community. That is, until 1991, when Latvia regained its independence from the collapsing Soviet empire.

In Riga's synagogue, tucked into a small corner of its magnificent Old Town, a swirl of languages drifts around me. To me, it is a most frustrating tangle of tongues, since I can barely understand a word.

Once in a while, I think I can hear a word in Russian. Then again, it might be Yiddish, but who the heck speaks Yiddish?

Nevertheless, since it is the High Holy Days and I have come here to feel holy, it's time to do some praying, these indecipherable side conversations notwithstanding.

Rabbi Shneor, one of two Chabad rabbis in Riga, understands my dilemma and tries to help. But he tells me there aren't too many prayer books in English, and hands me one in Russian and Hebrew. For some reason, he apologizes.

Finally, the prayers begin, and the cantor, who has a voice that's slightly lower than that of the 1970s soul sultan, Isaac Hayes, but twice as loud, is belting out Hebrew.

I start to feel as if I'm on firmer linguistic ground. Still, this confusion over language persists throughout the High Holy Days as I meet people.

My favorite question comes from a visiting Belgian who asks me in Hebrew if I can speak French. Not so well, I reply, watching his face become a mask of disappointment.

When not distracted by language, I find myself plied with food and some religious thoughts on these High Holy Days. There are three rabbis in Riga; two are from Chabad, and they both invite me to their apartments for meals.

At Rabbi Schneor's uptown apartment, it is a Hebrew-only meal, with Orthodox trimmings to start Rosh Hashanah. I do my best to keep up with the food and the rapid-fire dialogue of four Israelis, but I just can't do it.

My ears drift off during Rabbi Schneor's extended d'var Torah.

At Rabbi Glazman's apartment, there is more English, slightly less dogma, and a personal revelation on the Shabbat before Yom Kippur.

There's more English because Rabbi Glazman spent eight years in Brooklyn and his wife grew up there. There's less dogma, perhaps, because the rabbi came to Riga in 1992 to help build up Jewish life, which was obliterated after Nazism and communism.

After we mark Kiddush and wash our hands, the rebbitzen asks me my name, which, for me, is the pivotal point of our evening. I tell her, but add that Rabbi Schneor, calls me Baruch, which is my Hebrew name.

The rabbi pauses for a moment and weighs in, "So Baruch is your real name. The other one is fake."

I mutter some reply and he says, "Baruch is a blessing, what could be better than a blessing?"

Now Lambert family lore has it that when I was born, my late grandfather, Ralph, heard my name and said, "What am I going to call him?"

Almost 28 years and thousands of kilometres away from my family, I'm convinced somewhere in heaven, on these High Holy Days, my grandfather is smiling.

NEXIA INTERNATIONAL

Courses offered on-line

RAMAT GAN, Israel — University students can now take online, for-credit courses that feature a "virtual guided tour" through Hezekiah's tunnel, a virtual helicopter ride over modern Jerusalem, the sights and sounds of Moroccan prayer services and – most importantly – lectures from some of Israel's top scholars.

These are some of the highlights of Bar-Ilan University's new Virtual Jewish University or VJU, the brainchild of several former Canadians in Israel.

"Many universities lack the faculty needed to get into the details of Jewish history and culture," said former Torontonian David Schwartz, the VJU director, and head of the Information Systems Division at Bar-Ilan's Graduate School of Business Administration, as well as the editor of the International Journal of Internet Research. University."

On Oct. 4, the VJU fall semester will begin with six new courses in English: Jerusalem throughout the Ages, War and Peace in the Bible, the Judean Desert Scrolls, the Jewish Calendar and Holidays, the Laws of Marriage and Relations and Music in Jewish Society and Culture.

VJU credits, with a formal Bar-Ilan University transcript, are transferable.

For more information or to register online, visit the VJU Web site at http://www.bar-ilan.edu. Or call 1-888-BIU-YEAR. Registration ends Oct. 4.

The Week in Israel

Sept 20
• Yom Kippur

Sept. 21
• Prime Minister Ehud Barak held talks with German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder. Barak was the first leader since World War II to visit Berlin since it became the seat of government in the reunited Germany. (Barak began a two-day visit the following day with French government officials in Paris.)

• Police questioned a Jerusalem contractor, his wife and daughter for seven hours regarding three years of work he carried out in the home of former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The work was billed to the Prime Minister's Office shortly after Netanyahu was defeated in the May elections.

Sept. 22
• Barak named Gadi Baltinsky, a former journalist and spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy in Washington, as his communications adviser.

• Israel began building a neighborhood of 52 houses in the Golan Heights. The construction comes amid efforts to restart Israeli-Syrian talks.

Sept. 23
• Barak reaffirmed his campaign pledge to withdraw all Israeli troops from south Lebanon by the middle of next year. "I don't advise anyone to test us when we draw back" [to the international border], Barak said after meeting with French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin in Paris. His comments came one day after Israeli jets raided suspected Hezbollah positions in Lebanon.

• In another effort to end a crisis with Shas over funding of its educational system, Barak convened a later-night meeting with Yossi Sarid, minister of education, treasury officials and leaders of Shas.

Sept. 24
• Police arrested another Israeli Arab, the sixth, on suspicion of involvement in the terrorist attacks in Haifa and Tiberias earlier this month.

Let your kids experience 5000 years of their Jewish heritage. (And let us pick up the tab.)

Imagine your son or daughter exploring the streets of Jerusalem. Or relaxing at the Dead Sea. Or hiking up Masada at sunrise, or going on an archeological dig in the Negev Desert. Now imagine someone sending them to do it, free. Birthright Israel, a planned partnership of philanthropists,

Jewish communities worldwide, and the people of Israel through their government, was created to give an increasing number of Jewish youth the opportunity to visit Israel for the first time through a variety of educational peer group trips. This experience will strengthen their ties to our culture and heritage in an accessible and exciting way. The Birthright Israel gift, which is now offered to college students, covers round-trip airfare from designated departure cities and 10 days of land and program costs in Israel. Spaces are now being filled for college winter trips, so log on to our website or simply give us a call. Birthright Israel—a gift from one generation to the next.

EXPERIENCE THE GIFT OF ISRAEL

European nations push fair trial for Iranian Jews

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — European nations pursuing expanded relations with Iran are raising the issue of 13 Jews being held on charges of spying for Israel and the United States.

During a meeting last week with Iran's spiritual leader, Austrian President Thomas Klestil discussed the fears and concerns of the European Union regarding Iran's human rights record.

In his meeting with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Klestil spoke about the 13 Jewish detainees and four students condemned to death for their alleged role in leading the July pro-democracy demonstrations in Tehran, according to a report issued by Agence France-Presse.

Meanwhile, in New York last week, British Foreign Minister Robin Cook reportedly brought up the issue of the Jewish detainees with his Iranian counterpart, Kamal Kharazzi, during a meeting at the United Nations.

The hour-long discussion is the first time in 20 years that the United Kingdom and Iran have exchanged foreign ministerial visits. Cook is reportedly planning a trip to Iran next year and said he would bring up the issue again then.

Klestil's visit was meant to develop bilateral relations and to give support to the liberalizing reforms of Iranian President Mohammed Khatami.

Responding to Klestil's concerns, Khamenei reportedly said, "We are very sensitive to problems such as espionage, and we ask for nobody's permission to punish anyone."

The 13 Jews, the youngest of whom is 16, were arrested in March and have remained in custody in Shiraz, a city in southern Iran, while awaiting trial by a revolutionary court. Their ranks include a rabbi and several teachers.

Iran's official news agency, IRNA, quoted Khamenei as saying, "We hate spies, whether they work for Israel or anyone else.

"If their crime is proved by the court," he said, "they will probably be punished."

The news reports quote Khamenei as telling Klestil, "Zionist agents are everywhere, in Austria, too," adding that he knew of such agents' subversive activities in Austria, without giving details.

Spying for Israel or the United States is punishable by death in Iran. Iran maintains that several Muslims were involved in the espionage along with the 13 Jews. Both Israel and the United States say the espionage charges are unfounded. Advocates for the prisoners adamantly insist they are innocent.

On Sept. 15, the European Parliament passed a resolution demanding the release of "all the prisoners, to enable them freely to prepare their defence with the lawyers of their choice."

An amendment to the resolution says that "any dialogue between the European Union and the Islamic Republic of Iran must be dependent on respect for fundamental human rights."

Hujat al-Aslam Hadi Marvi, Iran's deputy judiciary chief, said in remarks published Monday that a trial is unlikely to occur soon because several people associated with the case are outside Iran.

"The 13 Iranian Jews who are under arrest are accused of spying; we are not saying they are spies," Marvi was quoted as saying in the English-language magazine Iran Daily.

According to news reports, he said the accused would be allowed to choose their own lawyer.

Because of the political nature of the charges, the case would be heard not by a jury, but by a judge, who would determine whether the trial would be open.

Advocates for the 13 in the United States and Iran have been working in recent weeks to arrange for legal representation.

Marvi is also reported to have said that some of the Jewish detainees had admitted to their crimes. These confessions, he said, make up the bulk of the evidence against them.

But last week, the head of Iran's hard-line judiciary, Gholamhosseib Rahbarpur, said that the courts had strong and sufficient evidence to prove the case against the alleged spies.

Iranian-American Jewish groups welcomed Marvi's comments as a gesture to allay European concerns that the prisoners receive a fair trial.

"But the true test for Iran is not in words but in action," said Pooya Dayanim, a lawyer in Los Angeles who is the spokesman for the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations.

ADL survey quantifies Russian anti-Semitism

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — A combustible mixture of anti-Semitic attitudes and despair characterizes a substantial segment of the Russian population, according to a new survey.

About 44 percent of the 1,528 people in the survey, conducted for the Anti-Defamation League (ADL), agreed with at least six of 11 statements that express stereotypes about Jews.

A similar survey conducted by the ADL in 1998 showed that 12 percent of Americans harbored strong prejudice against Jews.

And only seven percent of Russians believe that their country is headed in the right direction, creating what the survey, quoting a man from a 1998 focus group, calls an age of survival in Russia today.

The survey results provide quantitative evidence of the bleak portrait that has been painted anecdotally in Russia since last August, when the country's economy collapsed.

Several anti-Semitic bomb attacks and incidents have occurred during the past year, and last fall prominent Communist lawmakers made repeated, public anti-Semitic comments.

The ADL called the findings "extremely troubling and potentially dangerous, especially in a climate of political and economic turmoil, and as acts of political and popular anti-Semitism increase in the Russian Federation."

The survey "puts into black and white what many people have believed. Now we have the documentation," said Mark Levin, the executive director of the National Conference of Soviet Jewry, which entered into a partnership with the ADL and the Russian Jewish Congress earlier this year to combat anti-Semitism and promote democracy and tolerance.

"This should be a clarion call to focus" on the issues of anti-Semitism, human rights and democratization, Levin added.

In part, the survey asked respondents to agree or disagree with statements about Jews, including "Jews, more than others, are ready to use unscrupulous means to achieve their aims" and "Jews in Russia these days exercise too much power."

Other statements on this chart asked individuals to agree or disagree with statements such as, "Too many banks in Russia are controlled by the Jews" and "Jews have many irritating traits."

The findings demonstrate the problems that led to the creation of the new partnership between Jewish organizations in the United States and Russia, said Levin.

The partnership is devising a strategy – including public service announcements, educational curricula and pressing political parties to add human rights to their platforms – to achieve its goals.

At the same time, however, a majority of respondents agreed with several positive statements about Jews, including, "Most Jews are decent, honest people" and Jews contributed their share to the Soviet cause during World War II.

This finding is consistent with other surveys of prejudice – as the survey report notes, positive beliefs about a particular group often coexist with negative ones.

In other findings:

- 71 percent believe the last year or two have been the hardest of their lives.
- In the United States, anti-Semitic attitudes are most prevalent among people older than 65 and those without higher education; in Russia, anti-Semitic attitudes are spread more evenly throughout the population. Women under 45 and women with higher education are the least likely to hold anti-Semitic beliefs.
- An overwhelming majority of Russians expressed political apathy – 70 percent agree that "whether or not I participate in the coming elections, nothing will change."
- Respondents exhibited a high level of anger toward the United States. Eighty-seven percent agreed that the "United States is taking advantage of the economic difficulties Russia is experiencing to strengthen its influence in the world"; and approximately 10 percent think President Clinton is a real friend of Russia.
- In general, Russian politicians are not viewed favorably. Only four percent of respondents said they like Russian President Boris Yeltsin. Former prime minister Yevgeny Primakov and Moscow Mayor Yuri Luzhkov had the highest favorability ratings – at 72 percent and 60 percent, respectively.

The Boston-based Marttila Communications Group and a Moscow-based opinion research firm ran the survey, which was conducted in face-to-face interviews in Russian. The survey, conducted in May and June, has a margin of error of plus or minus three percentage points.

Two new drugs approved to fight breast cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two new drugs, Herceptin and Arimidex, have in recent studies been shown to be effective in the fight against breast cancer.

Not only do these drugs appear to be more effective than tamoxifen, the current drug of choice, but patients report fewer side effects.

In fact, the survival rate for women with advanced breast cancer treated with Herceptin, especially when combined with chemotherapy, is 24 percent, the highest survival rate in 40 years.

Herceptin, the trade name for trastuzumab, is the first of a new class of drugs called monoclonal antibodies. Unlike current medications, which attack both diseased and healthy cells, monoclonal antibodies target only the cancerous ones.

Speaking at a recent press conference, McGill University oncology department chair Brian Leyland-Jones, who was involved in much of the research, said Herceptin is particularly effective in women with advanced breast cancer.

Nearly a third of women with breast cancer have what Leyland-Jones described as an "overexpression" of the HER2 (human epidermal growth factor receptor-2) gene. HER2 is a protein found on the surface of all cells.

Under normal conditions, each cell contains two copies of the gene that produces HER2. In some women, however, the gene overexpresses or produces more than two copies – in some cases, as many as six, 10 or even 12 copies. When this happens, there is uncontrolled cellular growth, a hallmark of cancer.

Because it is associated with a particularly virulent form of breast cancer, the overexpression of HER2 is a "prognostic marker" for the disease, Leyland-Jones explained.

Recent trials with Herceptin have shown a 50 percent increase in the rate of response to therapy, a 58 percent increase in the duration of the response, and a 65 percent increase in the length of time a stage of the disease lasts before the disease progresses to the next stage.

One of the most significant aspects of Herceptin, is that there are virtually no side effects. This is in contrast with the devastating side effects from chemotherapy and radiation, such as hair loss, nausea, vomiting and mouth sores, which can lead to a very poor quality of life.

However, those people who take Herceptin with chemotherapy or radiation therapy, still have the side effects from those treatments.

Arimidex (anastrozole) suppresses estrogen, a hormone which feeds and sustains tumors.

The results of a randomized, double-blind study were presented recently at the 1999 European Cancer Conference in Vienna. Arimidex was found to delay the spread of cancer by 31 percent, controlling cancer growth for nearly twice the time that tamoxifen does. As well, fewer women developed blood clots.

While saving lives is obviously the most important consideration, the significance of reducing side effects must not be minimized. Suzanne Giroux, a woman with advanced breast cancer who has taken part in the study on Herceptin, said she had decided that she could not bear any more chemotherapy or radiation.

Herceptin changed her life, she said at the press conference. "After my treatment, I go shopping or rollerblading. I can even go back to work."

The cost of Herceptin and Arimidex is comparable, about $2,700 per month. Both drugs have been approved for use in Canada.

Jewish senior citizens urged to be wary of scams

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the most frequent scams directed at Jewish seniors in Toronto is a letter from Brooklyn,N.Y., purporting to be from a Holocaust survivor asking for donations to pay for his daughter's wedding.

"Thank goodness most people don't fall for this, but it's an indication of how cleverly con artists will direct their schemes at certain ethnic groups," said Robin Haley-Gillin of the Volunteer Centre of Toronto.

Only 10 percent of people who are victims of these scams report to police because they are too embarrassed, said Haley-Gillin.

The ABCs of Fraud program, sponsored by the centre and by Scotiabank, has been successful in reducing the number of those victimized, she said.

During their presentations to seniors, facilitators encourage the audience to take part.

"When our volunteer speakers come back, they tell us what kind of scams are popular in that area."

Two of the volunteer speakers are Ruth Gelber, a retired school teacher, and Bernice Henry, an artist.

The ABCs of Fraud program has been presented to senior groups at Shaarei Tefilah and Beth David-B'nai Israel synagogues, the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Bernard Betel Centre, the Wagman Centre, and the National Council of Jewish Women building.

In addition to Toronto, the program is offered in Vancouver, Calgary, Halifax, Winnipeg and St. John's.

One of the favorite con games is to tell a senior that she or he has won a prize and that the taxes on the prize need to be collected first, Haley-Gillin said.

But then letters are sent to the victims saying more money is needed for customs clearance and asking them to convert the original amount to U.S. funds. Finally, as if rubbing salt into the wound, this multiple approach ends with a letter from a firm wanting a 10 percent retainer to settle the matter.

"It sounds ridiculous, but these con artists are so convincing and seniors generally are polite and don't want to say no. Seniors don't need to be scared, they just must be aware," Haley-Gillin said.

For the ABCs of Fraud program, older adults are recruited and trained as volunteer facilitators to deliver entertaining presentations on frauds and scams, which include videos, skits, quizzes, handouts and lectures.

Young artists' exhibition a show of contrasts

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Dozens of people recently gathered at Gallery 401 in the heart of Toronto's fashion district for an exhibition of works by two young Toronto painters – Tracey Kornblum and Randy Gladman.

Both artists told The CJN they were thrilled with the exhibition, the first time their works were featured in a show.

The exhibition was one of contrasts, with Kornblum's figurative pieces juxtaposed with Gladman's geometric abstract works.

The Toronto-born Gladman, 24, graduated from the University of Western Ontario with a bachelor's degree in art history and film theory, and then went to New York City to pursue a master's degree in art history at New York University.

He said he started painting in his third year of university after receiving a paint brush as a gift for the opening of a group show displaying two of his photographs.

"I had always been a compulsive doodler and had already filled numerous sketch books with drawings, but my first canvas in 1995 marked a departure in my creativity, from black and white ink drawings to full-color larger scale acrylic paintings."

And while he took some studio courses at Western, he is largely self-taught, he said. "Most of my artistic development has been guided by my own devices and strongly informed by art historical studies."

The abstract style seen in the exhibition developed gradually, beginning in 1997. By 1999, "a definite style emerged," he said.

"I have been attempting to create compositions where a visual effect of spatial depth is created without the use of traditional methods of perspective. I have been concentrating on using various sharply defined layers of color juxtaposed in such a way as to create three-dimensional spaces from two-dimensional fields."

Gladman said his paintings are meant to "create feelings, moods and emotions in the viewer… I consider my paintings to be music, music which stimulates your retinas rather than your ears."

Like Gladman, Kornblum, 26, who was born and raised in Toronto, is largely a self-taught artist. Since 1995, she has painted privately commissioned murals in homes. She has also created book and CD covers.

A graduate of Trent University, in women's and cultural studies, she spent a year at Tel Aviv University.

This year, she worked as a studio assistant to a Canadian printmaker on Stoney Lake.

Since her return from Israel in 1997, Kornblum said she has focused on her art, and she began working on a series of paintings that reflect her relationships with those around her.

She said she regards her paintings — she works in acrylics on canvas and masonite – as a reflection of "the relationship between the viewer and the viewed."

Her style, which she calls interpretative figurative, signifies her work's realism and its surreal qualities, she said.

"I don't only capture the existing moment, I allow events to happen, static, until I can understand them, until they exist. At this point the painting functions as a lookout."

Actor comfortable in outsider's role

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alon Nashman fits the role of astronomer Johannes Kepler like an old shoe.

The 40-year-old actor calls on his Jewish background to play the role of a man, who although he was not Jewish, felt like an outsider in his 16th-century world.

In A Short History of Night by Canadian playwright John Mighton, Nashman follows Kepler through all the machinations that ensued when the worlds of science and religion collided.

"Kepler was a Lutheran in a Catholic society and he was an outsider," Nashman says.

A Short History of Night opens the season at Factory Theatre, Oct. 1 to 31. It won the 1992 Governor General's award and the Chalmers Award and Dora Mavor Moore award the same year.

Nashman thinks the play is an important one now because it deals with the fight between religion and science at a time when even scientists are discovering that there are mysteries in the universe that defy explanation.

"The play is important because after that, the world of science was in ascendancy."

But the actor believes that Kepler himself did not show any preference for either world, because he was so involved in the tumultuous political events of the era.

Nashman is fitting rehearsals for A Short History of Night around his home life with wife Elizabeth. They are the parents of a 1-month-old daughter, another daughter, Tiferet, 5, and a son, Herschel, 2.

He is a busy actor, called upon, in his words, "to do soul-stirring and mythic roles," as he did playing the Jewish cowboy, Lenny, in Easy Lenny Lazmon."

His talents and his singing voice (tenor, low f to high b) have drawn him into so many roles that he is one of the busiest actors around. He played parts, for example, in None Is Too Many and Reading Hebron by Jason Sherman.

"I am proud to be Jewish. I love playing the whole gamut of Jewish characters. It's a fascinating situation for me. And there are some great local Jewish playwrights, Sherman, Adam Nashman (no relation), Anton Piatigorsky, Alex Poch-Goldin and Jonathan Garfinkel.

Next January, Nashman will direct Garfinkel's latest play, Walking to Russia, which has a Jewish theme.

It will be his first major directing effort since he graduated in directing at the National Theatre School at the age of 30.

Despite working in a variety of roles, Nashman denies that he has "arrived."

"In this business, there is always a new challenge around the corner. Nothing allows you to relax, you are always under scrutiny."

This may be, but anyone lucky enough to have seen him play the cynical, yet ingratiating, bellhop in This Hotel by Poch-Goldin in The Fringe Festival earlier this year will believe he has "arrived."

Alon Nashman plays "soul-stirring" roles.

Singer blends folk, funk, Celtic and Hebrew

TORONTO — In celebration of her newest CD, Gypsy Hill, Susan Cogan has left the comforts of her Salt Spring Island home in British Columbia.

The internationally renowned singer/songwriter, instrumentalist and record producer packed her bags, kissed daughter Ora and husband Uri goodbye, threw a bed into her Toyota van, nicknamed the Spirit Princess, and embarked on a four-month cross-Canada, solo tour of coffee houses, halls, bars, bookstores, festivals, synagogues, Jewish camps and community centres.

Cogan was born and raised in Toronto. When she was 15, her father John Devor moved his family to Israel to make aliyah. There, her father bought her her first guitar as a Chanukah present and she attended a high school associated with a music academy in Jerusalem.

"War broke out while we were there, so I joined a troupe of working and studying youth who would perform in the evenings for soldiers. That was my first performance experience as a singer. I came back to Canada to finish high school and got my first paid professional job singing with my Uncle Benny Louis' big band," she says.

After she graduated, Cogan's family moved back to Israel, where she joined another Canadian, Fran Avni, to form the duo, Susan and Fran. The two rose to stardom, producing four albums and numerous compilations on other well-known artists' recordings. They are still heard on the radio today.

After five years, the duo separated. "I couldn't stay in the duo anymore because I had to explore my own life and my own music. I've been a singer with my own material ever since," Cogan says.

She married her Israeli-born husband in Canada, and lived in the country outside Toronto from 1974 to 1980, when the couple decided to buy a house. They were drawn to the beauty of the West Coast's mountains and ocean, where Cogan has recorded CDs, performed live, recorded movie soundtracks and appeared on television.

"I love performing because that's where the medium becomes the gateway to something else that happens. Without being trite, I'll put it into the spiritual realm. It's a communication and a touching of the heart that happens between the audience and the performer.

"I love to record; it's very gratifying if you like my recordings and you tell me so. If my CD sells well, it allows me to perform more. [But] there is something about live music – it is happening in the here and now, that is very important."

After recording Space-Age Primitives in 1993, Cogan had an experience with a Vancouver studio that went sour. As a result she partnered with producer/engineer Paul Brosseau to form a label to produce quality music, calling it Nomad, because the company began with mobile recording equipment but no building.

Her latest CD, Gypsy Hill, which Cogan describes as mixture of old and new material, is a family affair. Her husband, a Vancouver television station employee and desktop publisher, helped Cogan create the albums' graphic arts.

At the age of six, Cogan's daughter recorded a mystical melody she improvised herself, and her mother has included it in the CD.

Now 17, Ora, a singer/songwriter and crafter, continues to lend her talents to mom's career, as photographer of the CD cover.

On Gypsy Hill, Cogan blends sounds from the musical genres of world, Celtic, folk and funk, creating 11 innovative tracks.

"The themes seem to evolve around water and war. The very first track, Medicine Wheel, a song about native spirituality, starts with thunder; and the last song, Mayim, sung in Hebrew, the melody borrowed from the traditional horah dance and the words from Isaiah, ends with trickling water.

"I've really been enjoying this tour. I love what I do. I feel blessed in so many ways I just can't count them."

When her tour ends at the end of September, Cogan will be acting with the Payback Theatre Troupe and preparing to record a jazz CD and an album of Hebrew songs. Then she will tour Jewish communities throughout North America and Israel.

The singer/songwriter's first solo album, Susan Cogan One, will be released as a CD in the near future.

Cogan is passionate about many causes and was arrested for protesting against logging old-growth forest in Vancouver Island's Clayoquot Sound. She continues to lend her support and raise funds through her music.

To purchase her CD, call 1-877-CD-BY-MAIL, for up-to-date tour information, e-mail www.saltspring.com/susan.

BILLY WILDER, 93-YEAR-OLD LEGEND

The October issue of Vanity Fair magazine has already generated some headlines for its story Hitler's Pope, about wartime's Pope Pius XII who failed to denounce Hitler's Final Solution.

In a much lighter vein, the issue also contains an interesting interview with one of Hollywood's great legends: Billy Wilder, who at 93 can look back on a remarkable career as auteur-director of many celebrated films, including The Apartment, Some Like It Hot, Witness for the Prosecution, Sunset Boulevard, Double Indemnity and The Seven Year Itch.

Asked about Marilyn Monroe, who starred in two of these films, Wilder describes a difficult, tearful actress who rarely arrived on the set before noon and who sometimes needed more than 50 takes to deliver a simple line. She was "a continuous mystery with no solution," he says, but she added an immeasurable appeal to any movie.

Wilder also speaks about the joys of directing Gloria Swanson, William Holden, Barbara Stanwyck and Jack Lemmon, and says that of all his films, The Apartment was the picture with the "fewest obvious faults."

However, Wilder's all-around favorite Wilder film is Some Like It Hot, the idea for which originated in an obscure German film comedy of the early 1930s.

Of his longtime writing partner, I.A.L. (Izzy) Diamond who died in 1988 at the age of 67, Wilder says he was a reserved, taciturn man. He felt towards him as one would feel towards a younger brother, but "we never talked about personal things."

Perhaps the most startling revelation in the interview is Wilder's assertion that he had wanted to make a movie of Thomas Keneally's book Schindler's List, and had approached director Steven Spielberg to obtain rights to the story.

"We spoke about it," says the European-born Wilder, who lost most of his family at Auschwitz. "He was a gentleman, of course, and we acknowledged each other's strong desires. In the end, he could not give it up. He had to do it. I would have done it differently – not necessarily better. I wanted to do it as a kind of memorial to my mother and my grandmother and my stepfather."

The interview was conducted by Cameron Crowe, and was excerpted from a book, Conversations with Billy Wilder, to be published this fall by Knopf.

As an added plus, the current Vanity Fair also contains an interesting column by Christopher Hitchens on New Yorker writer and wit Dorothy Parker, including more on her famous feud with writer-playwright Lillian Hellman.

Fosse Returns: Fosse, the Tony award-winning musical based on the sexy footwork of Broadway legend Bob Fosse, is returning to Toronto for a five-week engagement at the Pantages Theatre. It previews Dec. 8, opens Dec. 9 and continues through Jan. 8, 2000.

Tickets ($20-$89) go on sale Oct. 2. 872-2222. For tickets to the opening night performance, a benefit for Casey House Hospice, call 962-7600.

Galati Returns: After recovering from knee surgery, dance teacher Michelle Galati is resuming her teaching career at the Koffler Centre of the Arts on north Bathurst Street. Galati will be teaching jazz, acro and pre-teen hip hop, as well as preparing students participating in the competition program for outstanding achievement in the new season.

"Michelle has a natural talent for challenging the best in her students," says Jacque Foesier, director of the Koffler Centre School of Dance.

To reach the school, call 636-1880, ext. 359.

Irving Berlin gives new regards to Broadway

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special To The CJN

NEW YORK — The story has it that when Irving Berlin's new musical Annie Get Your Gun was being readied for its 1946 Broadway opening with Ethel Merman in the title role, the legendary composer was so nervous about one particular number, There's No Business Like Show Business, that he was prepared to yank it from the show.

He didn't of course, and the rest is show business history.

A nostalgic look back at Buffalo Bill's colorful Wild West Show from the 1880s, Annie Get Your Gun offered a formula romance between hill-billy sharpshooter Annie Oakley and crack rifle shot Frank Butler.

The show introduced some classic Broadway hits, including You Can't Get a Man With a Gun, They Say It's Wonderful and the comic duet Anything You Can Do.

More than half a century later, a new Broadway production of Annie Get Your Gun, at the Marquis Theatre in Times Square, has proven the durability of Berlin's music as well as the story by Herbert and Dorothy Fields. While it's true that not every musical number has staying power, it's a wonderful, spine-tingling treat to watch as most of Berlin's simple, old-fashioned music takes on new life with this adept cast.

Bernadette Peters replaces the Merman charisma with her own unique brand of charm as Annie Oakley. If the show initially lacks sparkle, the situation improves the moment she makes her entrance. Tom Wopat makes an increasingly sympathetic Frank Butler. By the end of the second act, the stage chemistry between the two is almost electrifying.

With this production, which was directed by Graciela Daniele who choreographed the hit show Ragtime, we are given an unusual and certainly distorted glimpse of American society of more than a century ago. We are indeed receiving these stories of the old west through a glass darkly: first from the vantage point of the show's original framers in 1946, then through the eyes of its modern revivalists.

Thus, I regard it as a small triumph that we get even a seemingly genuine, albeit fleeting, perspective of American society of the 1880s. After her triumphant European tour, Annie and Frank meet at a New York ball, in which she looks with disdain upon all the lovely high-bred ladies with long white gloves – a reference, certainly, to the elite of 19th-century New York society known as the Four Hundred.

Annie Oakley's backwoods charm contrasts sharply with the slick sophistication of her urban rivals. Indeed, she hails from such honest and upright American pioneering stock that she hardly understands the necessity of female guile in order to win a man. Only in the closing scenes does she pretend to be a less talented sharpshooter than Butler, forfeiting a shooting match with him in order to secure him as a husband.

This battle of the sexes is certainly no less relevant today than back then, and no doubt will be equally amusing a century from now. Tickets, 212-307-4100.

A cycling tour of Jamaica's mountain range

BY JOSIE NEWMAN-PROVOST
Special to The CJN

BLUE MOUNTAINS, Jamaica — We hesitantly peddled our way down the side of the mountain in the rain, weaving gingerly around potholes and broken chunks of concrete.

The rain was a real tropical downpour, the kind that gets into every fibre of clothing and pore of the skin. Our orange rain ponchos were like beacons in the dark day, as I peered out at the rain forest surrounding me on all sides.

A lush abundance of tropical plants, fruits and vegetables met my gaze, from grapefruit and breadfruit to the African tulip, otherwise known as the danka pee-pee tree.

Damien, one of our guides, elaborated on the nickname, saying the plant smells like urine if it's split open and laughed as he told our group that Jamaican schoolboys carry leaves of the danka pee-pee to school and squirt them at girls.

We were at a height of 1,500 metres, at the top of the Blue Mountains, a range which covers much of the inner part of the island of Jamaica.

Our group of four was part of a larger group of some 30 cyclists who were being escorted by staff of Blue Mountain Bike Tours Ltd., a company which has existed for more than a decade in the mountains. Many of the cycling guides are residents or former residents of the Blue Mountains and know the steep, winding grades like the back of their hand.

Our day had gotten off to a slow start when the bike tour company's driver forgot to pick us up so our Jamaica Tourist Board driver had to drive us 2 1/2 hours from Ocho Rios to the Blue Mountains' peaks. This was OK, though – we were now on Jamaican time, mon. We'd already learned not to worry greatly about punctuality and accuracy whilst on the island.

It was hot and sunny, as we picked our way through construction. When we finally got to the top, the other cyclists had already started cycling and it was raining.

Gregory, one of our guides, helped us pick our way 14 kilometres down the mountain road to an open-air restaurant run by the bicycle company. By the time we got there the rain had stopped, the sun was shining and we saw some magnificent views.

Damien, still laughing about the danka pee-pee joke, was our guide after lunch. We still had eight kilometres to go. He showed us Summitfield, the village he was born and still lived in; it was part of the parish of Portland, population 5,000.

He guided us slowly through many other villages in the parish, even taking us by the mayor's house in Wakesfield. As we cycled, he told us about the life of the Jamaicans who live in the Blue Mountains. Many of them work on coffee farms in the mountains, making around $6 (US) per day for their labor. Many are unemployed – unemployment stands at around 40 percent in Jamaica.

Others, like Damien, have tourism-related jobs. The poverty and simplicity of life is apparent in the dwellings and faces of the people along the roadside. Many houses are mere shanties with small children playing outside the doorstep. Every small village has a grocery store, where a number of grown men and small children congregate. Along other parts of the road, women walk, balancing bags and baskets on their heads.

Very few people own cars. If they want to get anywhere, local residents must get up at 4:30 to catch a 6 a.m. bus at a stop partway down the mountain. Sometimes, they'll take taxis, but at a cost of $1.50 each way, it's expensive.

Residents with jobs off the mountain often spend a lot of time away from home. Damien's father spends all week at an armed forces base and comes home on weekends, while his mother is a nurse who spends several nights away from home a month.

The coffee grown and harvested in the Blue Mountains is some of the best in the world. We cycled past several small coffee farms dotted along the side of the road. Some even had For Sale signs posted. Dozens of men were selling bags of coffee beans.

Eventually, we wound our way back down to Silverbridge and Fish Dunn Falls, which translated means fish can't go over the falls. If there'd been more time, we could have gone swimming. Despite the 2½-hour drive back to Ocho Rios, the Blue Mountain bike tour had been worth it.

Portraits of Palestine

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Photographs of 19th-century Palestine were almost exclusively the domain of non-Jewish cameramen. In the 20th century, however, their monopoly was broken by a group of Jewish photographers such as Bernard Edelstein, Tsadok Bassan and Shmuel Yosef Schweig.

They roamed the land, snapping pictures and creating an intriguing portfolio of black and white photos which tell the story of Jewish life and settlement in Palestine.

In Documentors of the Dream: Pioneer Jewish Photographers in the Land of Israel 1890-1933, Vivienne Silver-Brody, an Israeli photographer and photo historian, presents an alluring portrait of a nation-in-the making.

Published by the Magnes Press, the Hebrew University and the Jewish Publication Society of America, this handsome coffee-table book is supposedly the first to chart the origins and development of local photography as seen through the eyes of Jewish photographers.

More than that, the author devotes an entire introductory chapter to the history of books about photography in Palestine. It is an extremely useful exercise.

Virtually all the photographs, plucked in the main from Israeli archives, are historically significant.

They are of rural and urban vistas. They evoke poetic passions, romantic impulses and Zionist industriousness. At least one veers into the realm of kitsch.

A 1905 photograph of a man and a woman carrying a cluster of newly harvested grapes in Rishon LeZion is biblical in essence.

A 1912 photograph of a kibbutz guard on horseback framed against the backdrop of wild flowers and a bare mountain evokes a bygone era.

Tel Aviv was an expanse of desert when it was founded in 1909. Judging by a medley photographs, Rothschild Boulevard., circa 1923, consisted of giant sand dunes, while Herzl Street, in 1910, resembled a glorified beach.

A photograph of immigrants' tents near Allenby Street in the early 1920s indicates that Tel Aviv was still a gleam in someone's eye. Fast forward to the late 1920s and Tel Aviv has grown into a town of modest proportions.

Jerusalem is seen from various angles, and the views of the Western Wall are particularly impressive. But perhaps the most original photographs are from the 1930s. Incongruously, a swastika flies from the balcony of the Hotel Fast. On King David Street, an Arab vendor leads a flock of turkeys for sale at Christmas time.

Immigration was the lifeblood of the Zionist enterprise, and on page 228, there is an excellent photograph of new arrivals being processed at the port of Haifa. It is reproduced on the cover of this book.

Not every photograph works. A 1919 photo of an art student dressed as Ruth the Moabite gleaning the fields descends into mawkishness. It is offset by a stunningly beautiful photograph of Arab fishermen casting nets into the sea at Jaffa.

All in all, a delightful book.

How To Sell Your Home Yourself and Avoid Paying Commission!

Toronto - A new report is now available to assist those home sellers who are serious about marketing and selling their own home.

Like thousands of other homeowners, you want to sell your house. Except unlike most of them, you want to sell it yourself, without the use of a real estate agent.

Why? Probably because you want to save the commission.

Sure! Why not. I can't blame you one bit. The thought of saving thousands of dollars certainly is appealing.

FREE REPORT WILL SHOW YOU HOW TO SAVE MONEY!

Call anytime 24 hrs., 7 days a week: 1-800-550-0059 and enter #ID 5260. Your report will be sent by mail, free, no cost, no obligation. Get this report before making any selling decisions.

Third year of operation

Roger Neilson's Israel hockey camp catches on

By PAUL LUNGEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Roger Neilson's annual hockey camp in Israel is getting to be a pretty big deal.

Neilson and his staff from his hockey camp in Lindsay, Ont. have made the Canada Centre rink in Metulla a regular summertime stop.

Word of the camp is spreading among NHLers and it's no longer a major feat to sign on. NHL Cool Shots, the TV show that features profiles of NHL players, has for the second consecutive year sent a crew to film the summertime extravaganza.

American and Israeli kids are flocking to the camp in ever growing numbers.

The only place where it isn't catching on in a big way is Canada, where only about a dozen youngsters from across the country enrolled in the 1999 edition of the summer hockey school.

Nevertheless, the camp has proven once again to be a tremendous success, said Marshall Starkman, goaltending instructor and one of the organizers behind the event.

Fresh from his visit to Israel, Starkman was bubbling with pride at the tremendous strides the camp has made in its third year of operations.

Fifty-two Israeli youngsters from ages eight to 18 participated in the school while another 20 or so older skaters from the country's national junior and senior teams were in Metulla at the same time as the camp went on, he said.

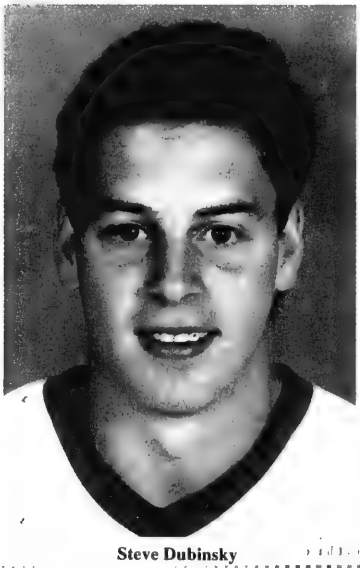
Although the national players were in Metulla just to get some extra ice time, the younger kids were put through their paces by instructors from the Neilson camp – the same instructors Canadian kids train with in Lindsay.

They included Alex Andjelic, coach of the Belfe Tigers, a Dutch first division team based in Amsterdam, Geoff Brennagh, a player/coach in Belgium, Dave Clement, an AAA coach in Peterborough, Starkman, Jeff Budd, a former volunteer leader in Metulla, and NHLer Steve Dubinsky.

Dubinsky's enthusiasm for the program was infectious, Starkman said. "He just wanted to take in the whole experience... He was into everything. He wanted to do everything."

One of only a handful of Jews to play in the NHL, Dubinsky helped out during the practices on the ice and really identified with the kids, Starkman said. "They knew he was Jewish. I'm sure it was meaningful for them too."

For Dubinsky, a 29-year-old native of Montreal who plays for the Calgary Flames, it was his second visit to Israel.



Steve Dubinsky

Back when he was 18, he spent six weeks working on a kibbutz. This time, his wife, Sheryl Leiber, accompanied him, also a native of Montreal, and the two visited Jerusalem, Yad Vashem, Masada, Tel Aviv and other sites.

Where in the past, Neilson had to search high and low for an NHLer to accompany the instructors to Israel, this year it would have taken a team of wild horses to keep Dubinsky away from the camp.

Dubinsky came to Starkman's attention through connections in Calgary. The NHLer had approached the local Jewish community and informed them he was interested in getting involved in some sort of community work.

The United Israel Appeal and the Canada Israel Experience Centre (CIEC), which are involved in arranging the summer camp and other youth visits to Israel, were informed of Dubinsky's interest.

Starkman visited Dubinsky in Calgary to size him up and showed him videos of the camp, "but before I had finished, he'd made his mind up that he was going. I really didn't have to sell him on it."

Dubinsky was so enthusiastic about the experience, he's already indicated he would like to return and be involved in the future of the camp, Starkman added.

Florida Panther Bill Lindsay, who participated in the first camp, three years ago (last year, Danius Zubrus of the Montreal Canadiens attended), has also indicated he wants to return, Starkman said.

Getting Canadian kids to participate is another story. "Every year it's a bit of a struggle to get them," Starkman said. "We had hoped to get 22, but in the last month, we had filled only 11 spots."

Meanwhile, back in Israel, the Israeli kids presented a real mixed bag of hockey skills. Some of them were roller hockey players who were skating on ice for the first time ever; others were veterans of previous camps. They and the North American kids were taught the basics of the game in morning sessions and they scrimmaged in the evening.

Hockey, however, was only one part of the program. Each afternoon, the CIEC structured programs for the visiting youngsters that included kayaking on the Jordan River, trips to the Golan Heights, visiting a kibbutz, touring Safed and other outdoor activities, Starkman said.

For the second year in a row, two youngsters from the Ice Hockey in Harlem program participated in the camp, along with four other Americans and one nine-year-old from Holland.

And for the second consecutive year, NHL Cool Shots was on hand to film the camp. The New York-based show is planning to air five features from Israel, including a show that will be co-hosted from the Jewish state

"Israel will be getting tremendous exposure," Starkman said. As for himself, "the camp is a lot of work, but it's fun. It's almost like a vacation."

Neilson, the Philadelphia Flyers coach has already made his intentions clear.

"He told the kids on the final night that he loves it and he'll be coming back next summer," Starkman said.

The Inside Back

Talmud Kanadi – Masechet Sukkah

By JORDAN MAX

The sukkah: Of what is it made?

R. Yose haGolani, who lived in the far north, said the boards are made from the cedars of Lebanon, or else the inhabitants will freeze from bitterly cold winds.

But R. Akiva, who lived in the south, said they make the sukkah out of canvas, or animal skins.

Last Laugh

R. Elazar ben Azariah said, I am like a man who is 70 years old, and have seen many sukkot in my days, and the best are made by fitting wooden walls together.

And how do they fit them together? Rava said one upon one, the second on the first and so on, but with cross-beams for upper support, to brace against the wind. Abaye said to attach opposite sides first. But the sages agreed with Rava.

R. Eliezer said one who does not use beams will have no share in the World to Come. R. Shimon haTzadik said in the name of R. Yehuda that they should not fit perfectly, because of the Destruction, and so the wind may pass through.

R. Yochanan ben Zakkai asked his students: "What is the best sukkah?"

R. Eliezer ben Hyrcanus said, "A strong one." R. Yehoshua ben Chananya the Chiropractor, said, "One that carries [easily]." R. Yose HaCohen said, "One that one can build with a friend." R. Elazar ben Azarya said, "That which takes up less storage space [in the garage so the car will fit]." R. Yochanan said, Elazer ben Azarya was correct, for his encompassed them all.

And what is the best design? Beit Shamai said it should be a square of at least 8x8 cubits, in remembrance of the Temple Mount, which was 500x500 (cubits). But Beit Hillel said it should be minimum 8x12, or better yet 10x12, and regardless, it should be rectangular so it can seat more people. Rava brought a Baraita that this is so, as was proven by R. Hypotenus the Greek.

Nonetheless, Abaye maintained that it should fit the backyard patio, or better yet a deck. But if the deck is not large enough, they should use the backyard, whether or not there is a patio.

R. Yehuda said a patio is preferable, since it does not ruin the grass or flowerbeds, as long as it is near the kitchen and has not too many steps; otherwise they may drop the food bringing it to the sukkah. This is considered a bad omen and does not bring peace between husband and wife. Thus they concluded that the one who builds should consult his wife on the placement of the sukkah.

How do they attach the walls together? R. Akiva said they use nails from Timna, but R. Meir said bolts with pre-drilled holes are better, since one does not hit his thumb from hammering and moreover they are reusable. But R. Akiva replied that this leads to twisting and tendonitis.

R. Meir said in the name of R. Yochanan that a power tool is a thing of beauty. R. Dosi the Bandaged said, "What is a power tool? I have used nails and a hammer all my life, and, lo, have damaged all my fingers."

Ben Zoma explained that he has a tradition from Moshe Rabeinu that the power tool was created just before the creation of man, but that the power screwdriver is superior to all.

To which was asked: Which bit is truly superior, Phillips or Robertson? R. Akiva explained that the Robertson provides better control while turning the screw, but with much less torque.

R. Nudnik of Chelm asked, Why not just hold the screw and turn the sukkah around? And the sages threw him out of the house of study.

Rav Picasso asked in the name of Rav Huna, "How is the sukkah to be decorated to make it beautiful?"

What is beauty? Rav Papa said beauty is in the eye of the holder of the power tools. But R. Huna said, it is in the eye of the bee holder, who makes devices which lure and trap the pests, preventing them from ruining Sukkot meals. On this the sages did agree, that one who traps bees is meritorious indeed.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm starting high school this year, and I have many worries about what the new school year will hold for me. My first concern is that I won't make any friends. Not all of my friends will be coming with me to high school. However, with respect to the ones that are coming, I worry that a competition will occur where all of us will be overly concerned with whom we meet and which close friends we make. What if my friends get invited to parties that I'm not invited to? What if I don't find my own circle of close friends? Another worry is that academically, the work load will be too hard. I'm a good student, but I know that the work is more difficult and complicated in high school. How should I deal with these worries of mine?

High School Worrier

Dear High School Worrier,

The worries you are having are typical concerns. Anyone who attempts a new situation has these feelings. The fact that you are already worrying about making new friends and doing well in your studies shows that these things are important to you, and you will do your best to achieve these goals.

When your friends come up to you to show off and compete with you for friendship, you must ignore their comments and maintain confidence in your own social skills and personality.

Do you think that just because you are surrounded by hundreds of new people, you must befriend them all. You should concentrate more on creating bonds with a certain amount of friends whose company you enjoy. It is more likely that you'll prefer to get to know a smaller group of people well than just becoming acquaintances with a larger group.

As for academics, there are different ways to pace yourself with your work load. First of all, try not to become overwhelmed. It is obvious that your work from elementary school changes once you become a high school student. You should make yourself a schedule where you work on different subjects at different times.

Don't forget, your teachers are there to help you, for they are quite aware of the challenges you will be facing.

You will find high school work is somewhat demanding in comparison to elementary. However, as the school year develops, you will begin to establish your own working habits which will lead to a comfortable working atmosphere.

If you find yourself overwhelmed at the start of the school year, remember to take it slowly and pace yourself academically and socially.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

Your gift lifts lives

Getting older and feeling older don't have to go hand in hand. Your UJA Federation gift helps to fund the Bernard Betel Centre, which makes aging an energizing experience. Unfortunately, many of Jewish Toronto's 33,000 residents over 65 can't come to the centre because they require special care at home. Increased funds raised during UJA Federation's current Campaign 2000 will subsidize more respite hours for family caregivers to receive temporary relief from the demanding responsibility they've assumed. Your support for Campaign 2000 will also provide additional transportation assistance for the frail elderly to participate more fully in community life. Together we're lifting lives for those who deserve nothing less and so much more.

Take your Wedding Video home, on DVD!

For over 13 years, DMS Video Productions has been producing Toronto's finest videos. "Our primary goal is to satisfy every customer we're privileged to work with. Working with our customers from the beginning until the end, is how we ensure their complete satisfaction," says Darren Sager, President of DMS Video.

When asked "What makes DMS Video different?", Darren responds: "We capture your event without making you feel like you're on a Hollywood set. There simply is no need to film with an ornate amount of equipment and lighting. Your guests will feel comfortable since our approach is unobtrusive from the beginning. Our advantage is the SONY DVCAM Digital system."

Digital cameras can work under much lower light levels than traditional analogue cameras, yet they still deliver a brighter, sharper and more colourful picture. When filming is complete, digital editing ensures that not only will the video maintain the original camera quality, but the tape won't suffer from degradation over time, like programs found on current VHS tapes.

"For the last 2 years, every one of our videos has been digitally mastered. This way, when our customers take home their VHS tapes, they also have the choice to take home a (future-proof) digital master tape that they know will long outlive their VHS tapes and allow them to transfer to a future digital format" says Darren.

Now, DMS Video has moved into the future of video with the introduction of DVD (Digital Video Disc). "We're very excited about this. For the first time ever, we are offering our videos on DVD. Now we can shoot, edit and deliver our videos digitally, so our customers can play their digital videos at home" says Darren.

DVD allows you to access any part of your video within seconds. The convenience of DVD means you can skip through the video just like you skip through songs on a CD. When you're done , no more rewinding, you just pop the disc out of the machine. DVD is the future of home video entertainment delivered today. With a picture quality almost 2½ times sharper than VHS, DVD delivers the quality consumers have long waited for.

"This is going to change the way event videos are viewed and delivered" says Darren. "We're just getting started with DVD and the response has already been overwhelming!"

If you are looking for a video unlike any other, DMS Video is just the studio for you. For more information you can contact DMS Video Productions at (905) 881-7677 or you can visit them on the web at www.dmsvideo.com

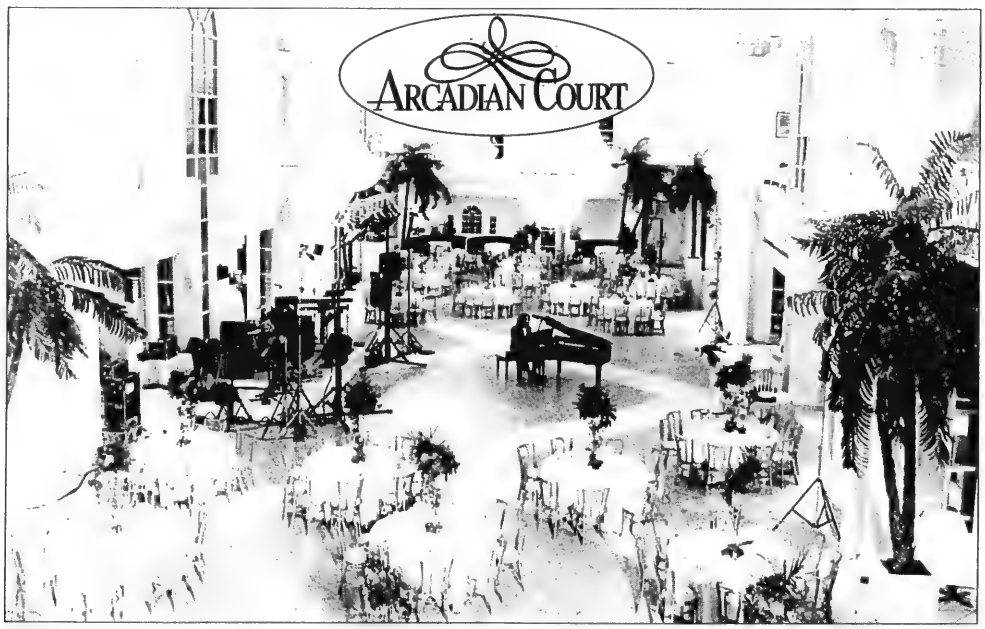
Hudson's Bay Catering offers splendid setting for simchas



Ever faithful to the Bay's tradition of customer service, Catering Manager Harley Freedman oversees fabulous receptions for weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, and corporate functions in what is arguably Toronto's most breathtaking setting.

The main dining hall, or "Arcadian Court", is an architectural masterpiece of historic interest. Sculptured 48-foot ceilings tower over a beige-and-earth-toned tile floor dotted with real palm trees. Four massive chandeliers illuminate the proceedings.

The Court, which must be seen in person to be fully appreciated, is skirted by massive Roman columns and banked with exquisite semicircular seating enclaves which, together with the central seating arrangements, allow the room to accommodate large parties comfortably.

Built in 1929 and renovated in 1987, the Court spans two entire floors of the Bay building on Queen Street. The gallery overlooking it is available for your pre-dinner reception.

The downtown location adds to the sense of history, and makes it a particularly nostalgic venue for parents and grandparents who grew up in the vicinity.

A spectacular setting demands equally spectacular cuisine, and Hudson's Bay Catering delivers with eclectic menus prepared by highly skilled chefs. The keyword here is flexibility; you can choose from a wide variety of menu packages or create a custom menu, tailored to your taste and budget.

Harley has 20 years of experience in the catering business, and he and his staff are well-equipped to assist you in your simcha preparations. He welcomes the opportunity to meet with you and discuss your needs.

Sephardic Kehila Centre: all in one, no compromises

Superlatives and hyperbole are the stuff of bridal advertising. Gowns are stunning; banquet halls are spectacular; food is the finest; service is white glove. So when you hear these or similar adjectives used to describe the Sephardic Kehila Centre, don't believe a word of it. It isn't that good.

It's better.

One of a kind in every sense of the term, this magnificent edifice so far exceeds its billing as to make mere words inadequate. Once you've set foot inside it, all other facilities pale in comparison.

From the foundation up, it's a work of art that will redefine forever your notion of "attention to detail". Virtually every design element of the Centre is custom-made. If whole buildings could reside in the Louvre, the Sephardic Kehila Centre would take its rightful place beside the Mona Lisa.

The Sanctuary at the Sephardic Kehila Centre: awe-inspiring

Its most compelling attraction as a simcha destination is that it's the only all-in-one facility in which no component of the simcha is compromised. Synagogue, cocktail reception area, banquet hall, cuisine, service: it leads in all areas, and does so at prices that will have you scratching your head and asking, How Is This Possible?

Synagogue. The two-level sanctuary, reminiscent of the famous Córdoba Synagogue of Spain, features rich cherry wood seating and wall panelling, and an awe-inspiring, towering three-tier Aron Hakodesh. Its 100 foot high gold leaf domed ceiling is girded by twelve stained glass windows depicting the twelve Tribes of Israel. It has become Toronto's most sought-after location for chuppah ceremonies.

Catering to the entire community

Attention to detail: Its Brit Mila chair was hand-carved by a master craftsman.

Cocktail reception area. If the Sephardic Kehila Centre's lobby doesn't leave you gasping, then you're either an experienced mountain climber or incredibly blasé. Adorned with a delicately veined mosaic tiled marble floor, slanted floor-to-ceiling soaring glass wall and forty foot high granite archways, the lobby is flanked by a series of magnificent Magen Davids and torah scrolls fashioned from polished brass and brushed steel.

Banquet room. Take another deep breath as you enter the Grand Ballroom. Three larger-than-life crystal chandeliers with gold Moorish trimmings, each one custom made with over 700 bulbs and 3,000 pieces of crystal, overlook a dining area appointed with exquisite taste.

Attention to detail: Each piece of gold-trimmed Royal Doulton fine bone china and sterling silver cutlery bears the Sephardic Kehila Centre logo.

Cuisine. A team of superb chefs whose geographic repertoire knows no bounds will bring the four corners of the world to your table. The cuisine, like the facility itself, caters to Jews of all origins, but if you wish to explore the finer elements of Moroccan cuisine, Kehila's resident expert, Mme Alice Zhrien, is there to serve you with four decades of experience in this genre.

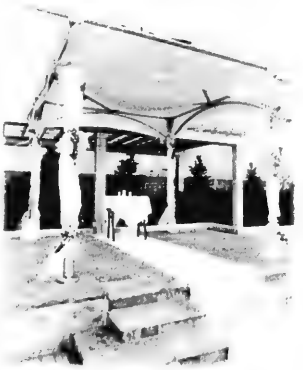
Attention to detail: The Kehila Centre raises the bar on presentation, striving for perfection not only in each meal, but in each plate.

Service. Assisting you throughout the proceedings are Director of Catering Joe Boussidan, a native Torontonian, and Catering Manager Craig Gruzd, originally from South Africa. Both Boussidan and Gruzd have spent their entire adult lives in the Kosher food and hospitality industries. Their mission: to ensure that the entire affair is greater than the sum of its parts.

In that vein, says Boussidan, each simcha unfolds like a Broadway play. From the moment the curtain rises on your function until it drops, Kehila's entire cast and crew performs with opening-night gusto for your pleasure. In lieu of thunderous applause, two simple words from you will signify Mission Accomplished. And if it's true that a picture says a thousand words, it's also true, suggests Boussidan, that your heartfelt "Thank You!" resonates more than a thousand handclaps.

Each simcha like a Broadway play

Attention to detail: The importance of bringing closure to the festivities with a sweet ending cannot be overstated.



Chuppa ceremony outside or in

Enter The Kehila Sweet Table, an artistic display of beautifully crafted food that will leave an indelibly sweet impression on both your eye and your palate. This staggering array of confections begins where other desserts end.

All-Inclusive Affair packages

Price. Though you'd expect to pay a king's ransom for the level of opulence you'll experience at the Kehila Centre, nothing could be further from the truth, says Boussidan. All-Inclusive Affair packages are available at affordable prices and include use of the Sanctuary, the Lobby, the Grand Ballroom, all taxes and gratuities. That's right — you can enjoy all of the facilities described above for a fixed fee, with NO EXTRA CHARGES. These packages have proven so popular that the Kehila Centre is already heavily booked into the year 2000 and beyond.

Boussidan, who measures success by the satisfaction of his customers, notes that catering is the most personal business because "every guest is a professional eater with a personal vested interest in what you put on their plate, so you want them to absolutely love it. You want them to remember each and every detail of their simcha fondly and vividly, for as long as they live."

Lights...Digital Camera...Action!

If you and your children have been to a Bar or Bat Mitzvah in Toronto over the past ten years, played in a corporate golf tournament or attended a gala fund raiser for any number of charitable causes, you've probably had your picture digitally captured and superimposed onto a magazine cover by Irv Nadel. Whatever the theme of your simcha or special event, whether it's sports, the movies or your favourite hobby, whether it's being held at the Hockey Hall of Fame, the Atlantis Nite Club, the Four Seasons Hotel or at one of Le Parc's grand ballrooms, Irv and his company, M&A Photovideo Inc., have been there many times. Using the latest in digital imaging technologies, they will custom design a graphic layout, complete with logos, text and pictures, that reflects the theme of your special event. Whether it's a birthday party for fifty children, a black tie affair with five hundred guests or a trade show with five thousand attendees, by the end of the night everyone goes home with a unique and innovative photo keepsake that adds value to the event long after the party is over.

The digital event system includes a high- end Kodak digital camera and a specialized Kodak printer running with a laptop computer that uses a customized Kodak PC Event software package. One of these systems alone can easily produce over two hundred 5" x 7" photographs in the course of a normal evening affair lasting four to five hours. Some of the other products they produce include trading cards, backstage passes, ID tags and 8" x 10" posters, all presented in a variety of attractive stand-up acrylic frames or folders. They are even capable of producing CD covers, photo mugs, T-shirts and mousepads! With seven of these systems available and an equal number of specially trained event crews, they are often performing their magic at six or seven parties every Saturday and Sunday night throughout the year. During the week it's golf tournaments, trade shows, award dinners, fund raisers, graduations, proms, camps and sporting events. At a typical evening affair the system is set up in the ballroom or in the cocktail reception area. As the guests arrive, they are politely requested to pose for the camera, either alone, as couples, or in groups. Once your picture has been taken, the image is transferred from the camera to the computer, where the operator approves it and immediately begins to process the pictures. Quite often, up to a hundred guests can be photographed before the dinner begins. The shooting and processing goes on throughout the party and by the time the main course is over, the completed pictures are arranged on a display table for the guests to pick up as they leave. At the 1999 Thornlea Secondary School Prom, 450 students and teachers were amazed to go home with their special photos the same evening and every year at the annual Mel Lastman Charity Golf Tournament, over 600 golfers receive a personalized photo bag tag which is waiting for them on their dinner tables before the round of golf is over. The Oakdale Golf & Country Club recently held a 70's Swing Dance Night for their members. The gift that night was a complimentary CD compilation of 70's hits that featured each guest's picture on the inside cover of the CD.

After doing this for ten years, Irv still hears the same gratifying comments at every event, what a great idea and isn't it amazing what computers can do today? Not only do the guests go home with a very special souvenir, but they are treated to an entertainment spectacle, as many guests will stand around the computer to be dazzled by the speed of the imaging process and to marvel at the outstanding quality of the digital photography. M&A Photovideo Inc. often gets two or three calls on the Monday following an event from guests inquiring about their own upcoming party, Nadel says, and this is how the business has grown, mostly by word of mouth from satisfied customers! They also receive many referrals from a number of event planners and co-ordinators in the Toronto area. Their corporate client list has become so extensive that they now have trained operators with their own systems in Montreal, Calgary, Ottawa, Edmonton and Vancouver and several in the United States, as well. They recently co-ordinated an event in Las Vegas on behalf of the American Ski Company, owners of several high profile resorts throughout the U.S.

At weddings, M&A offers personalized instant digital thank-you cards, group photos and Wedding Bell magazine covers featuring the bride and groom as well as the guests. They also can provide a digital/audio CD visual presentation of the day's events and/or a life-story of the bride and groom including historical family photos. M&A also has a number of professional portrait photographers on staff to help you with your most special day.

The newest innovation being offered this year by M&A Photovideo is their exclusive Blue Screen "Chroma-merge" Technology. This system has the subject being photographed in front of a solid coloured screen. The image is then lifted out of the screen and superimposed into any other scene. Imagine being photographed at the Beth Emeth Synagogue and then seeing yourself in front of the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem or standing in the ring with a WWF Superstar. There is no limit to where you can go with your imagination using this technology. One of their recent Bar Mitzvah boys had himself pictured with Pamela Anderson on the cover of TV Guide and another future NHL'er was featured facing off at centre ice in Maple Leaf Gardens. M&A is starting to get calls about this year's New Year's Eve Millennium parties, so call soon to make a reservation.

The staff at M&A Photovideo has always believed in the personal touch and makes a point of being involved in every project. If you are interested in learning more about M&A Photovideo Inc., Kodak PC Event Digital Imaging Systems and how you might benefit by using them for your own function... no matter how large the party or the location of the event.....call Irv, Janet, Andre or Al at (416) 362-6902 or e-mail them at info@specialevent.net. For a personal demonstration, Irv or one of his associates will be pleased to visit and discuss the details, and costs, in the comfort of your own home or you can visit with him in M&A's 3rd floor digital special event showroom located at 432 Queen Street East in downtown Toronto. Full details regarding M&A Photovideo Inc. and it's services can be found by looking us up at our convenient and easily accessible website at www.mandaphotovideo.com

THE ESTATES OF SUNNYBROOK

Splendor Endures at The Estates

Situated on 52 tree-filled acres not far from downtown Toronto is the elegant and graceful Estates of Sunnybrook. Comprising The Vaughan Estate and McLean House, The Estates provides the ambience and richness to make your celebration special.

The splendor of The Estates is evident in every detail

Here you will find richly appointed rooms, and some of the most exquisite cuisine in our city, along with facilities to accommodate weddings with as many as 150 guests. Kosher catering is available.

McLean House:
Stately Sophistication and Elegance

The history of McLean House dates back to 1929, when James Stanley McLean commissioned innovative Canadian architect Eric Arthur to design a unique home for the McLean family.

The result was BayView – now known as McLean House – one of Ontario's most splendid Georgian-style mansions. Set amid the natural beauty of Gordon Culham's landscaping, McLean House is as magnificent today as when it was built.

Vaughan Estate:
The Grandeur Of a Baronial Manor House

The Vaughan Estate – originally known as Donningvale – was built in 1931 in a simple Elizabethan style typical of a large stone country manor house. The exceptional renovation has retained its historic nature, providing two elegantly appointed ballrooms, each with a capacity of 150.

The grandeur is also apparent throughout the beautifully sculptured gardens, walkways and tiered patio, gardens and stone pathways overlooking the Don River ravine. This makes The Vaughan a photo opportunity for your bridal group, family and friends.

Planning Your Wedding?

With a history of hosting weddings dating back to the 1930s, The Estates' wedding specialists carry this tradition of excellence into the 1990s and the next millennium. Personalized service and attention to detail are the qualities that make The Estates an idyllic backdrop for a memorable wedding.

Wedding couples look to The Estates for personalized service, central location, opulent interiors, free parking and superb cuisine with kosher catering available. Another important benefit when choosing The Estates, is knowing revenues go to research at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre. For more information call The Estates at 487-3841.

When Only The Best Will Do

Our two incredible mansions, McLean House and The Vaughan Estate, are fast being recognized as Toronto's finest event venue. Impeccable service, and inventive menus complement these impressive surroundings. Make your next wedding, bar mitzvah, anniversary or special event one of your dreams. Let our expert staff make your next celebration perfect. Call today.

Laurentian vows to wow!

It is natural to give someone we care about a special gift. Since jewelry has always been special, we have given one another presents of jewelry since the beginning of time. The joining of two people in marriage is one of the most significant events in their lives and, in virtually all cultures it is common for gifts to be exchanged and jewelry to be worn on the wedding day.

The custom of placing the wedding ring on the 4th finger seems to owe its origin to the notion that a special nerve or vein runs directly from the finger to the heart.

In your search for up-to-date jewelry fashion a visit to Laurentian Jewellers is a must. There you will find an attentive staff (mostly family members), whose 50 years of tradition in the jewelry business continues to serve 3rd and 4th generations of clients.

In Montreal, where the factory is located, Laurentian has built an impeccable reputation as a family-operated business. Open in Toronto for over a year, the showroom has attracted many former Montrealers who no longer need to wait for a trip to Montreal to visit their trusted family jeweller.

Michel Korman, who continues the family tradition in Toronto, emphasizes that when buying jewelry, quality as well as price must be considered. "Laurentian doesn't hold sales," he says. "We just have excellent prices. There are no gimmicks; you can depend on constant, steady prices throughout the year."

Often, customers come in wishing to remodel their jewelry, but not quite knowing what they want. For decades, Laurentian has been updating jewelry by sitting with the client one-on-one and establishing together what the customer's desires are.

Michel Korman, G.I.A. gemmologist, will sit with you and help you choose the perfect diamond to suit your budget, all while creating the engagement ring of your dreams. Not to leave the groom out, Laurentian carries a vast selection of name brand Swiss watches, Breitling and Raymond Weil among many others.

You'll find Laurentian Jewellers at 1858 Avenue Rd., Suite 200, 3 blocks south of Hwy. 401, entrance on Old Orchard Grove. Drop in, or call at 782-3588.

Designer reaps rewards for patience, persistence

Q What does one of Toronto's foremost bridal designers have in common with a dyslexic teenager whose brightest job prospect in high school was slinging hamburgers?

A Everything. Kim Ironmonger not only has much in common with that person, she is that person. Or was.

Her personal and professional odyssey began some fifteen years ago. Ignoring the burger-slinging scenario envisioned for her by a high school guidance counsellor, Kim hopped a plane to England to buy accessories for her father's business, and discovered bridal gowns.

The rest is history. With a clientele that ranges from celebrities like Whoopie Goldberg, Elizabeth Hurley, and Amy Cable (wife of Doug Gilmour) to first-time brides on a modest budget, Kim gives each and every customer her very best, and then some. If life has taught her anything, she says, it's "never to indulge in elitism. I owe everything to my customers — and my parents, who taught me that commitment means always doing what is right, not what is convenient."

Driven by a passion for perfection and an artist's eye for detail, this self-taught designer nurtures her clients' visions and helps bring them to fruition rather than imposing her own design preferences. "A customer who's involved in the design process is a happy customer," she smiles.

Bearing out this statement is the fact that over her 15-year career, virtually all of the brides dressed by Kim have given her an unsolicited testimonial letter. This unheard-of-ratio, she says, means far more to her than mere dollars and cents. It speaks of a relationship between designer and client that transcends business. "When a customer calls you her friend, she is paying you the ultimate compliment."

Never one to rest on her laurels, Kim recently moved from her old location in Yorkville to new, larger quarters in Forest Hills.

A visit to the new Valencienne at 1104 Eglinton Avenue West underscores Kim's grasp not only of the design process but also of the environment in which it is conducted. The lush decor is both compelling and soothing, with its salmon-and-cream colour scheme, dreamy-soft carpeting, and stately armoires that house some of Kim's finest creations. Luxurious fabrics and exquisite detailing are the rule, as are the unexpected design twists that are her signature. These gowns usually provide the bride-to-be with an inspiration for her own wedding dress, but just as often are snapped up on a love-at-first-sight basis.

"Valencienne" is named after a town in Northern France known for its intricately detailed lace. Kim, never one to aim low, thought her business should bear a name that evokes high standards. But don't ask her to engage in comparisons between her work and that of Paris or London. This former teenage dyslexic is far too busy sketching, designing, and beading necklines at 2 a.m. — for she has promises to keep, and miles to go before she sleeps.

Stavros Master Tailor: quality for the 3rd millennium

Master tailor Stavros Theodoropoulos' name has long been a synonym for quality materials, design, tailoring and service. He was tailor to the Greek royal family; celebrities like Jerry Lewis wear his suits; and each of his thousands of loyal customers places a high premium on unique, hand-crafted garments.

Now, he's taking these fine qualities into the third millennium, and his new decor symbolizes this movement into the future.

Floor-to-ceiling windows showcase fine suits. The high ceiling makes the showroom more spacious; improved lighting brings out the colors and textures of garments and fabrics on display. And the gleaming marble floor gives the room a classic air, juxtaposed with the inviting warmth of rosewood panelling.

Stavros' major expenses are for things of substance. His fabrics — the finest wools, silks and blends — come from the world's best mills. His meticulous hand work, which no technology can replace, turns these fabrics into the finest garments money can buy.

This new showroom is Stavros' way of saying that the tradition of quality has a bright future. The new decor's blend of simplicity and richness expresses the same qualities Stavros imparts to a suit, jacket or shirt.

A Stavros suit, created to fit your unique tastes and body build, has long been the Rolls Royce of tailoring. Now you'll find the equivalent of a Lamborghini or Ferrari here as well.

Stavros is always learning and innovating. If you love an older look, always in style, it's still here. But styles change; and you'll find the new look too, with its soft pads and linings, natural or soft shoulders, high lapels and three-buttoned single-breasted jackets.

Stavros is not merely a custom suit maker, but a designer as well. He has created a new line of ready-to-wear suits, made by Nervesa of Italy, and two new lines of shirts, made by Aster of Italy and Eton of Sweden.

Nor must quality be prohibitively expensive. You can have the modern look in a ready-to-wear Stavros suit for prices starting at $1,500, with the same materials, design and workmanship that have earned him an international reputation.

Tuxedos are a Stavros specialty; for an original design you'll find in no catalogue, Stavros will ensure your physique and features are optimized on special occasions. You'll also find a wide range of the best overcoats, unique ties and accessories here. See for yourself; Stavros is located at 95 Cumberland Street, on the south side east of Bellair, and can be reached at 924-8144.

Sam Firestone Caterers: where others skimp, they splurge

Consistent first class cuisine has made the Firestone name legendary over nearly four decades of synagogue catering. Under the direction of Executive Chef Jimmy Lyras, Sam Firestone Caterers has earned an enviable reputation for unsurpassed quality and excellence in all the menus they serve. But they're equally well-known for their willingness to give the little extras that others don't. Like a doting parent who insists on putting one more helping of food on your plate, Les Firestone is always willing to "go the extra mile" to accommodate a customer.

Creating and preparing authentic regional dishes is a Firestone forté. "I know," says Les, "that when my staff promises a dish, whether it be Moroccan, Italian, Chinese, or even Greek, it will have an authentic taste — as if it came directly from that region. I take great pride in this authenticity, and people know they can count on us for it."

Unequalled service is another term synonymous with the Firestone name. Les stresses his availability and dedication to clients. "I am always available to address any questions or concerns. The people I deal with know they can come to me at any time, and I will help them to the absolute best of my ability. My only concern is making your simcha perfect. The size of the party and the synagogue affiliation have absolutely no effect on my service. Whether your function is large or small, nothing gets in the way because nothing but perfection matters. And our prices are competitive."

If you're seeking a special setting for your next simcha and haven't yet seen the renovated banquet facilities at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, a visit is definitely in order.

The facility brings together the popular shul's traditional haymishe feeling and the elegance of Sam Firestone's catered events, allowing you to enjoy the festivities in beautifully updated premises that would be the envy of many standalone banquet halls.

The dining room's stunning transformation is the work of designer Nurit Bloomberg. The "new look" is neoclassical with distinct architectural details. Decorative mouldings, a delicately latticed drop grid ceiling, maple panelling, columns and unique paint finishes give the room a warm, rich, natural glow. The window treatments feature an exquisite combination of sheers and swags, enhanced by soft indirect lighting. The omnipresent use of graceful, elliptical shapes ties the room together effortlessly.

The banquet hall seats parties of up to 400 with room for dancing. For auditorium-style functions, seating can be arranged for up to 650 people. Standing functions can accommodate about 1,000 people. Additional rooms are available for a wide range of events.

Firestone and Shaarei Shomayim take pride in the additional services they offer at no extra charge, such as a beautiful bride's room, ample free parking, and a full time, on-site mashgiach. Just a few more good reasons to consider Sam Firestone Caterers for your next simcha.

Israel should not be too trusting of Iran

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It was reported in Jerusalem a few weeks ago that a change has taken place in Israel's attitude toward Iran and that we no longer regard that country as our enemy but instead define it as a "threat."

The report aroused considerable attention in Tehran. The extremist elements supporting Iran's spiritual leader Ayatollah Ali Khameini were not bowled over by the news. As far as they are concerned, Israel is an unkosher animal from any angle.

Nonetheless, the report did spark great interest in Iran among intellectuals, university students, members of the country's business community, and even, according to one news item, the top brass, and it was welcomed by these groups.

The problem is that these people do not wield the real power in Tehran. Neither this subgroup nor President Mohammed Khatami rules the country. Moreover, we must not reach the conclusion that the Iranian threat, as it was once more defined recently by military intelligence experts in their annual report to the government, will become any less lethal, even if more moderate forces enter the corridors of power in Tehran.

The assessment of the Americans is that, even if President Khatami were to pilot the ship of state, it is doubtful whether he would be able to halt the progress of any of Iran's strategic projects, such as long-range missiles, which Israel defines as a threat to its national security.

In any event, the real significance of the response among certain Iranian groups to the report that appeared here is that some circles in Iran are open to the idea of exchanging ideas with their counterparts in Israel and that we should not regard Iran as a monolithic society.

Initially, the Iranians tried to establish a clear demarcation line between their approach to the United States and their approach to Israel. When that tactic failed, they adopted the notion, which they

Joe Clark talks to The CJN

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joe Clark wears the mantle of leadership confidently these days, less than a year after re-winning his old job as head of the federal Progressive Conservatives. He's so confident, in fact, that he's ready and willing to admit, in a retrospective moment, that a promise he made to Canada's Jews over 20 years ago was a mistake.

Prior to his nine-month prime ministership in 1979-'80, Clark, who three years earlier shot out of nowhere to defeat Brian Mulroney and Claude Wagner for the Tory leadership, pledged to the Jewish community that as PM, he would move Canada's embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Yom Kippur Throng

TORONTO — A crowd estimated at between 5,000 and 7,000 gathered here for Yom Kippur services hosted by the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC). Most congregants gathered outside Fisherville High School, where JRCC spiritual leader Rabbi Joseph Zaltzman conducted services for about 750 inside. The rabbi later addressed the throng outside as well. The service was one of four conducted by the JRCC, including one for Jews of Bukharan descent.

Abella Acclaimed

SHERBROOKE, Que. — The Canadian Historical Association (CHA), at its recent annual meeting held here, unanimously acclaimed Prof. Irving Abella as its president. Abella, co-author of None is Too Many and a past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, is the association's first Jewish president. The CHA represents over 1,000 historians and archivists, and lobbies governments, archives and museums.

B.C. Youths Win Silver

VANCOUVER — Sixteen British Columbia youths brought home a silver medal in soccer from the Jewish Community Centre Maccabiah Games in August. It was the first time a team representing the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver took part in the games, held in Cherry Hill, N.J. More than 1,300 Jewish youth from Canada, the United States, Britain and Israel participated.

ISRAEL

Nobel for Weizman?

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Ezer Weizman is a front-runner for this year's Nobel Peace Prize, a Norwegian newspaper reported last week. Among those who nominated Weizman was Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, who cited the Israeli president's consistent support of the Middle East peace process.

Israelis in Taiwan

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials have offered to dispatch medical assistance to Taiwan, which suffered a devastating earthquake last month. About 70 Israelis were believed to be in Taiwan at the time of the tremor. Israel's Trade and Culture Mission in Taipei, aided by Israeli volunteers, has made contact with or obtained information about the whereabouts of most of the 70.

WORLD

Ukraine Issues Visas

KIEV — Ukraine has agreed, after months of delay, to let some 500 youths come to Israel for the Jewish Agency's Na'aleh program. Ukrainian officials have delayed issuing the necessary visas, claiming the program, which promotes immigration to Israel, was recruiting the country's best and brightest youth.

Boy Returns Home

LOS ANGELES — Benjamin Kadish, a 5-year-old wounded in the shooting rampage at a Jewish community centre in suburban Los Angeles returned home from the hospital on Sept. 23. Kadish was one of five people wounded in the Aug. 10 attack. The other victims – two young boys, a teenage girl and a receptionist – all left the hospital within days of the attack.

Israel Aids Russia

MOSCOW — Some $100,000 in humanitarian aid arrived in Russia from Israel last week to help victims of the recent bomb attacks on apartment buildings. The aid consisted of medicine and medical equipment for survivors of the blasts.

Vandalism, Anti-Semitism

MOSCOW — A single shotgun blast was fired at a window of the recently opened synagogue in the northwestern Russian town of Borovichi on Yom Kippur eve. Prior to Rosh Hashanah, vandals desecrated dozens of graves in a Jewish cemetery in Astrakhan, 2,000 kilometres south of Moscow.

Meantime, a new poll released by the Anti-Defamation League shows that more than four out of 10 Russians hold anti-Semitic views.

Disney Assures Arabs

UNITED NATIONS — Arab foreign ministers meeting here recently decided to accept the Walt Disney Co.'s assurances that an exhibit at its Epcot Centre will not portray Jerusalem as Israel's capital. A spokesperson for the Arab League said the Arab states consider Disney's response "to delete any reference about Jerusalem being the capital city of Israel [to be] an important step."

Argentine Jews Blast Government

BUENOS AIRES — Some 1,000 people crowded into a synagogue here late last month to hear an all-too-familiar message: The government has not done enough to solve two anti-Semitic bombings that occurred earlier this decade.

Also familiar were some of the rituals that accompany commemorations of such events, in particular, the recitation of Kaddish.

Those attending the event included Israel's ambassador to Argentina, Yitzhak Aviran, an outspoken critic of the Argentine government's failure to find those responsible for both the 1992 car bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires and the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish centre – attacks that killed 115 people and left hundreds wounded.

The president of DAIA, an umbrella group of Jewish associations, accused anti-Semitic elements within the government, the security forces and the justice system for the lack of progress in prosecuting those responsible for the repeated attacks on the community.

His comments – and the event itself – came one week after vandals desecrated 63 tombs at the La Tablada Jewish cemetery near Buenos Aires.

Immigration reforms seen cause for concern

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Canadians should be concerned about a federal government blueprint that could erect dramatic barriers to immigrants lacking a university education, immigration experts say.

The document, leaked to the media last week, shows that Ottawa plans to make it extremely difficult for many skilled tradespeople to get into Canada, thanks to a new emphasis on higher education.

The blueprint calls on the government to chart a new course, and select immigrants who are highly educated and thus, supposedly better able to adapt to the Canadian and global economies. It also recommends that newcomers have a better command of English or French.

Immigration experts warn that if adopted in its current form, the policy would make it unusually hard for semi-skilled workers and skilled tradespeople – they have traditionally formed a large segment of immigrants – to enter the country.

With this latest development, Ottawa "is going to continue the same mistakes it's been making over the years: ignore everything except the upper strata of the workforce," warns Guidy Mamann, a Toronto immigration lawyer and president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services' (JIAS) Toronto office.

"I mean, how many engineers and lawyers do you need?"

Mamann adds that this document reinforces recent shifts in immigration policies, away from considering newcomers' experience, and toward judging them solely by their education.

It could translate, he says, into Canada accepting someone with a recent degree in computer science, but with little or no experience, and rejecting someone with no degree but with years of computer experience.

The new scheme does not bode well for Jewish newcomers, he feels, because a "significant" number of them are skilled tradespeople, such as machinists and electricians.

Jewish newcomers

Compounding the problem of Jewish immigrants, he adds, is the fact that while many are highly educated professionals, a lot of academic degrees granted in their countries of birth are not recognized in Canada.

"It's very, very clear [this] will make it more difficult for Jewish immigrants to come to Canada," Mamann says.

He says the blueprint is likely the result of the government bowing to pressure, and reacting to the current sour attitude many Canadians are expressing toward immigrants.

And it could mean, in the long run, a shortage of tradespeople.

"We'll have all these computer programmers and engineers, but somebody will still have to lay bricks and somebody will still have to be a plumber," Mamann says.

Skilled workers make up about half of the roughly 200,000 annual immigrants to Canada.

Michael Bryks, executive director of JIAS' national office, is also worried about the government document. "I would be most concerned by any immigration policy or model that fundamentally ignores what newcomers have to offer this country," he says.

"Higher, formal education doesn't necessarily mean a better or more productive citizen. Canadian immigration history certainly bears this out. Think of your Jewish grandparents for instance.'

"Not all immigrant hopefuls have had equal access or opportunity to higher education in their country of their origin. Are they to be penalized for this? We should hope not."

Mamann feels the immigration department will have a hard time selling the policy to the government.

And even if it does, an ironic consequence, he predicts, is that because Ottawa will have set such high standards, it won't be able to fill its own quota of well-educated immigrants.

Those Tishrei days

The Tishrei holy days, 5760, are over. They are a unique, three-week opportunity, a gift to us, a framework for the most significant of personal journeys, inward, to the less travelled-to places in our hearts and our consciences.

The month begins literally, with a wake-up call from the old, in fact, ancient, reliable alarm clock: the shofar. But it has no snooze option. And as with all snoozeless wake-up calls, we can choose either to respond or to remain in a state of spiritual torpor, induced, in many of us at one time or another by the paradox of modern life: a sense of super individual sophistication alongside gnawing self-doubt and alienation.

It is easier to ignore the alarm. And being only human, most of us do. But the clock remains ticking.

Ten days later, the alarm rings again, only once, but very loudly: Yom Kippur.

Even those of us who avoid responding to the alarm, understand and acknowledge in private ways, the special quality of this 10th day. And if we cannot find the strength or the will to travel inward, at least we recognize the 10th day as an occasion to accept responsibility for our occasional, though altogether human, failings, if we want to.

As most behavioral scientists will agree however, 10 days is a long-time for human beings to maintain a state of serious, concentrated, personal introspection. It can lead to high anxiety.

Thus, five days later, we begin an eight-day celebration whose chief obligation, divinely ordained, is to find joy, to express happiness. The celebration culminates with rabbinically-encouraged parades, flag-waving and merriment.

This holy day was clearly intended to be a time of emotional release and catharsis from the high-stakes, nervous first 10 days of the month.

It is not surprising that the "Tishrei days" are tied to the nature and to the needs of the human psyche, to our strengths and our weaknesses.

We are enjoined to examine our place on earth, even our place in time, but not to be overwhelmed by that examination and certainly not to feel inadequate at the uncounted possibilities to which the ancient alarm bids us respond.

Ezer Weizman

The alarm is put away for another year. But the clock keeps ticking.

It always does.

It has become a tradition on Sukkot for the president of Israel to hold an "open house" at which time, the state of the nation, to borrow an American term, is discussed with members of the media.

From his earliest days as a "flyboy" in Britain's Royal Air Force, to his involvement as one of the founders of the Israel Air Force, Ezer Weizman has always shown a flare for the flamboyant.

He was and is an outspoken person and he has conducted his presidency in that same undiminished, outspoken manner.

Much to the chagrin of the prime minister of the day, and despite the sharply-worded criticisms from politicians and political analysts, he has never recoiled, while president, from speaking out on political matters.

Last week Weizman spoke out against the obstinacy of President Hafez al-Assad of Syria: "At a certain point there's a limit. We are today in a state of peace with Egypt and Jordan and at advanced stages with the Palestinians. If he [Assad] wants to join, let him come. I wouldn't run after him.

"Assad hasn't changed. How long is it possible to court someone when he doesn't move? We are all smiling to him and treating him nicely, as at the funeral of King Hussein. He stood a few metres from us, with a scowl on his face, without showing the slightest desire to meet."

Weizman was commenting on the apparent hardening in tone and in substance recently in the Syrian president's positions regarding peace with Israel.

The backdrop for Weizman's comments however, was more than the annual Sukkot presidential open house. It was also the electrifying news, reported in a Norwegian newspaper last week, that he was considered the front runner to receive this year's Nobel Peace Prize.

According to the newspaper, Weizman had been nominated for the prize by a long list of celebrities that includes Henry Kissinger, Egypt's former UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, Queen Elizabeth, Spain's King Juan Carlos and, of all people, former Nobel Peace laureate, Chairman Yasser Arafat. MBD

UJA Courts Young Lawyers

UJA Federation is making a strong case to young legal practitioners thanks to the new Young Lawyers Network (YLN).

The network, Co-Chaired by Sarit Goldman and Michelle Cass, offers lawyers 25-40, a wide array of unique opportunities to become more active in the Jewish community through UJA Federation fundraising and educational programming. In addition to monthly lunch'n learn sessions featuring high profile speakers, young lawyers can participate in mentoring programs for law students or contribute to YLN's jewishtoronto.net web site and newsletter.

Sarit Goldman

The "Work-a-Day for UJA" initiative, on November 4, is the first time young practitioners will have the opportunity to dedicate an entire day's salary to UJA Federation. "One day's earnings is not a lot to give up," says Bernie Gropper, an active YLN member who is overseeing the city-wide effort.

Michelle Cass

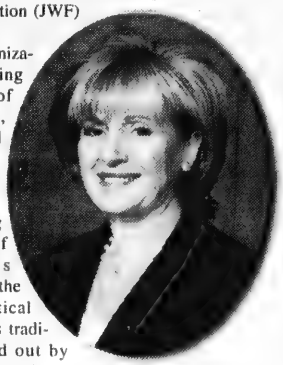
"Young lawyers often feel overwhelmed by their heavy workload, but it's not enough to go to work and then come home," explains Goldman, who has been active with UJA Federation through its Young Business Network for over two years. "Our goal is to show how UJA Federation can enrich lawyers' lives by helping them give back to the community."

Goldman and Cass are also planning to organize a free legal clinic that will provide assistance to needy members of the community. "We're really trying to make sure there's something for everyone," adds Cass.

To find our more about UJA Federation's Young Lawyers Network, please call Marc Bookbinder at (416) 631-5703.

Women's Campaign and JWF Unite

UJA Federation's Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) are merging.



"There is strength in numbers," says Dodi Weill of the merger between the two key organizations.

The two organizations, representing thousands of Jewish women, are in the final stages of a transition which will integrate the fundraising activities of Women's Campaign with the social and political advocacy efforts traditionally carried out by JWF. The new entity will continue to work closely with the more than 60 women's groups and organizations affiliated with JWF.

Leading volunteers in both organizations see the move as mutually beneficial and in keeping with developments in other North American communities. "There are only two other communities that still separate the two," explains Janice Langer, currently serving out her term as the last president of JWF. "The time has come for this to happen."

"Women's issues are communal issues," says Judy Engel, Immediate Past Chair of Women's Campaign. "I believe this step will not only raise our profile, it will be a more efficient use of time and resources."

"We have a lot to gain by sensitizing and educating women to work toward a shared vision," says Carole Sterling, Chair of Women's Campaign. "We could not execute our common goals without funds raised by UJA Federation."

"Working b'yachad – together - has always been our motto," adds Jill Reitman, Immediate Past President of JWF. "This is the logical next step."

Women's Campaign Vice Chair Dodi Weill will assume the first leadership position of the new entity in the Spring. "I'm extremely excited about the prospects that lie ahead," enthuses Weill. "It will be a new chapter in the long, proud tradition of communal involvement by Jewish women.

UJA Federation Leadership Profile

Sonshine and Frisch Reaching the Majors

Ed Sonshine and Ron Frisch are used to scoring high in the world of business. Now the two are teaming up to help raise millions of dollars for Jews in need from UJA Federation's leading donors.

"So far so good," reports Frisch, who is Co-Chairing this year's Major Gifts drive with Sonshine. Both Frisch and Sonshine are pleased with initial results from contacting contributors who collectively raised over $11 million last year. "It's still early, but we've seen some significant increases."

"We have some key factors working in our favour right now," says Sonshine. "Among them are last year's record-breaking $40.5 million campaign, a relatively strong economy and a wide understanding of the growing demands on Toronto's Jewish community."

Ron Frisch

The two established businessmen and long-time UJA Federation supporters say they feel fortunate to be in a position to contribute time as well as money to the community's central organization.

Sonshine, who was born in a German displaced persons' camp after World War II, immigrated to Canada in 1949 and went on to earn a law degree from York University's Osgoode Hall. In 1987, he joined Counsel Corporation, one of Canada's largest health-care and business development companies. In 1998, Sonshine and his Counsel Corporation colleagues Allan Silber and Morris Perlis, individually contributed extremely generous endowment gifts to UJA Federation. Although still serving as Vice-Chair of Counsel Corp., Sonshine's business focus has turned to RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust, Canada's largest REIT Company of which he is president.

"Continuity is very important to me," explains Sonshine. Setting a good example of tzedakah for my children is a large part of the philanthropic work my wife Fran and I do."

Ed Sonshine

"I feel privileged to be involved in this effort," says Frisch, CEO of his family's wholesale distributing business, Kohl and Frisch Ltd., where he works with his father and brother. Kohl and Frisch Ltd. is one of Canada's largest drug wholesalers.

A chartered accountant by profession, Frisch has been active with UJA Federation from an early age, serving as Co-Chair of UJA Federation's Food & Hospitality Campaign and as a Major Gifts canvasser. "My family has been involved with UJA Federation for many years and we strongly believe in the centrality of UJA to the Jewish community."

Frisch is also hoping his four children are watching closely. "I want them to know there's a bigger world out there and that we have a responsibility to each other."

"There is a strong sense of pride among our donors about the incredible work UJA Federation funds," adds Sonshine. "I'm proud of what we accomplish year after year."

Nussbaum was a founder of Agudah in Toronto

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Moshe Nussbaum, a founder and pillar of the Agudah movement in Toronto, was killed by a hit-and-run driver the day before Sukkot. He was 88.

Obituary

Nussbaum was on his way to one of the two Talmud classes he attended every day at Agudath Israel, a shul he founded.

Born in Tarnow, Poland, Nussbaum came to Canada after the war. He operated a building block company for many years.

He was very committed to the Agudah movement, said Rabbi Moshe Lowy, spiritual leader of Agudath Israel, who was brought to the synagogue by Nussbaum.

At his death, Nussbaum was vice-president of the Vaad Hapoel Agudath Yisrael, the world Agudah organization; president of Toronto Agudah and vice-president of Canadian Agudah, and was an officer of the American organization.

Nussbaum attended all the Agudah conventions he could, and participated enthusiastically.

He was a founder of Camp Agudah, Beth Jacob High School, Ner Israel, the Kolel, Perspectives (the Agudah newspaper), and was an active worker for Eitz Chaim Schools.

Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, principal of Beth Jacob, said that Nussbaum "almost daily went out soliciting funds for the school. He gave of his own resources, knowledge and skills."

After the school was built, Rabbi Stefansky said, Nussbaum regularly came to visit, "to see if there was anything he could be helpful with."

Nussbaum was "a very positive person. He had practical solutions to complex problems. Anyone who needed something turned to him for help," Rabbi Stefansky said.

Rabbi Lowy said that Nussbaum "saw youth as the future of the Jewish people," and, besides founding Camp Agudah, he supported Pirchei and Bnos, the haredi youth groups.

Among his other activities, he helped organize the Daf Yomi Siyum, a celebration marking the end of a worldwide study of the Talmud. He also helped support Israeli farmers who, in observance of the shmittah year, leave their land fallow.

Speaking for the family, daughter Brenda Lev said that they all felt shell-shocked. Still, she said, "he had a good life. He was well to the end, and had all his faculties. He was a special, wise parent."

Nussbaum's wife, Chaya, is too frail to be told of his death. Lev reminisced about how close they were. "He was so attentive to her, and treated her with the greatest respect."

Nussbaum will be remembered universally for his warmth, enthusiasm, and wonderful sense of humour. Rabbi Shmuel Klein, a teacher at Eitz Chaim, and editor of Perspectives, described him as effervescent.

As The CJN went to press, the driver of the sports utility vehicle that hit Nussbaum had not yet been caught.

Moshe Nussbaum

Nussbaum is survived by brothers Mordche and Meyer, sisters Fanny Weissmandel and Esther Roitenberg, children A.C. (Avraham), Chanie Levine, Ruchie Anisfeld and Brenda Lev, 18 grandchildren and 11 grandchildren.

Police conduct tests on suspect vehicle

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto police conducted forensic tests last weekend on the vehicle suspected of hitting and killing Moshe Nussbaum.

The black GMC Jimmy was seized last Wednesday after it had been brought to a west-end auto body shop for front-end repairs described as unrelated to the Nussbaum case.

It matched the description police had of the car wanted in the Sept. 24 hit-and-run death of Nussbaum at Bathurst Street and Joicey Boulevard.

Nussbaum was struck at about 5:30 a.m. on his way to morning services at Agudath Israel Congregation. Police say he was already prone on the street when he was hit, possibly after he fainted or stumbled.

An autopsy concluded Nussbaum died of injuries as a result of being hit by the car.

Police said the driver of the vehicle stopped, had a conversation with a passerby and then fled.

Det. Tom Fullarton told The CJN that the vehicle was taken to a police forensic lab to determine the origin of hair and "tissue" found on the front frame.

Fullarton said he would like the case wrapped up as soon as possible.

Police said that by fleeing, the driver of the vehicle turned the case from an accident to a criminal matter.

There were no arrests as The CJN went to press Monday.

When time advances, nations can too

A report appeared in Yediot Acharonot last week that Jordan, Egypt, the Palestinian Authority (PA), Israel and the United States have quietly agreed to establish a broad-based, common framework to combat terror. The initiative, it is said, is only in its embryo, but appears to be assuredly advancing. In each of the countries and in the PA, the matter has been turned over to security professionals "to put content into the agreement in principle" reached by the respective leaders.

If true as reported, the development will have important, far-reaching, substantive and symbolic implications.

All five "partners" are threatened by fanatic, fundamentalist-inspired terror and hatred, and thus there is a compelling internal logic for them to pool resources, information and know-how to thwart that threat. Indeed, according to the report in the Israeli newspaper, the idea originated with King Abdullah of Jordan during a meeting with Yasser Arafat. Only two weeks ago, Abdullah closed down the Hamas offices in Amman.

According to the paper, "Arafat passed on the idea to Prime Minister Ehud Barak. Barak gave his consent and encouraged Arafat to try to bring in Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Arafat left for a meeting with Mubarak, raised the idea and the Egyptian president also entered the picture."

President Bill Clinton agreed to the proposal, apparently, during a meeting with Arafat at the White House on Sept. 23.

Such a jointly calibrated effort against terrorism could achieve significant results. With honest, bona fide co-operation at the professional level, and equally bona fide resolve and determination at the political level, the infrastructure of terror could be severely impaired, if not eventually dismantled. The pieces of the terrorist puzzle that each of the five parties possesses could be assembled into a clearer, more compelling whole.

If shown to be viable and mutually beneficial, the co-operative structure might one day attract additional participants, possibly from Europe and the Middle East, thereby broadening the bloc's base of information and expertise and increasing the effectiveness of the fight against terrorism on a wider, more universalistic basis.

As important as the substantive soundness of the idea, is its symbolism.

Assuming it to be sincere, Arafat's high profile, public involvement in the anti-terror establishment would send an unequivocal message to his people that it is time for attitudes to change, that there is no longer any room in the national aspirations of the Palestinian people for the reflexive, hate-filled ideology of the extremists.

Israel already has bilateral understandings with the United States and Jordan, and to a lesser, problem-laden extent also with the PA, to fight terrorism. But an umbrella structure involving two Muslim countries, Israel, the United States and the PA is unprecedented. It could prove to the people of the region that when time advances, nations can too.

Prayers at Kotel should conform to Halachah

In her column about prayer services at the Western Wall, Jean Gerber bitterly attacks Orthodox Jews for their refusal to allow non-observant prayer at the Wall ("Cleaning the Stones," Sept. 16). Gerber makes the outrageous statement that the Wall "could be one of the most profane places on earth." This site, holy to Jews for thousands of years, can indeed become profaned if we fail to treat it with the utmost reverence and respect for tradition.

The Wall has always been a place where Jews could pour out their hearts and recite prayers which have been part of us for generations. It must never be allowed to become a site where prayers are said in a format that is contrary to Halachah and is deeply offensive to Orthodox Jews. You are welcome to engage in prayer as you see fit, Ms. Gerber, but please find another place to do it.

Takes issue with Vatican's views of Jews

Once again the Vatican would have us believe that Jews throughout the centuries have been the recipients of the established Church's benevolence. Such attempts, citing the positive attitudes towards the Jewish people of Pius XII, are incongruent with the views of enlightened Christian scholars.

Robert B. Morse, the distinguished award winning American journalist and author of While Six Million Died, informs us of the apathy of Pius XII when asked to speak publicly on behalf of the Jews, and the inherent anti-Semitism of the Catholic Church. This attitude is apparent in the April 17, 1937, sermon preached in Rome by Eugenio Cardinal Pacelli (later Pius XII) against the "Antico popolo deicido" – the God-murdering nation of the Jews.

Christian anti-Judaism eventually turned to genocidal anti-Semitism (the Holocaust).

Suggests free Jewish education more suitable gift

I read with interest the article entitled "Free Israel Trip Offered to Young Adults." (CJN, Sept. 23) If the goal of such a program is "to prevent assimilation and give young Jews a strong sense of Jewish identity," then may I respectfully suggest that the $300 million gift from Bronfman and Steinhardt could be much better utilized if applied to a free Jewish education for every Jewish child who wishes to have one. This would go a much longer way in achieving their admirable goals.

How Ve'ahavta helps the homeless

Lillian Freedman's comment about Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless program (MJRH) being "voyeurism" (CJN, Sept. 16) is very unresearched.

Since the launch of MJRH in March, Ve'ahavta has successfully helped to raise the consciousness of the Jewish community about the dismal plight of the homeless and has sent out over 120 Jewish volunteers to the streets of Toronto. Many of these individuals have subsequently committed to a second and third night out, as well as involvement in other long-term solutions for the homeless, such as housing and retraining programs.

Through MJRH, Ve'ahavta has established a special relationship with the native community and a Jewish presence on the streets. Most importantly, Ve'ahavta has eased the lives of some very cold and hungry people living outside who prefer to stay away from Metro's often unnerving shelters. Freedman would have done well to speak to some Ve'ahavta volunteers who returned home at 3 a.m. from a long and emotionally stressful night out. She might have discovered that their evening out involved far more than just watching the homeless, but rather a useful adherence to the Jewish value of tikun olam – repairing the world.

Iraqi Jewish assets were confiscated twice

By SASSON MAYER
Special to The CJN

As news about final status talks between Palestinians and Israelis fills the air, and possibilities of compensation have arisen, the controversy over the Jewish assets left behind in Iraq should be recalled.

When the State of Israel was declared on May 15, 1948, Iraq was among the Arab countries that sent their armies to crush the newborn state.

The Iraqi government declared martial law and, as a result, the Jewish community was subjected to all kinds of harassment and harsh treatment. Jews were fired from their jobs, hundreds were arrested and persecuted, many were condemned to jail sentences, some were ordered to pay hefty fines, and one prominent Jew was hanged.

The situation deteriorated day by day. Fear brought the community to a state of shock and despair and almost paralyzed it. Some young Jews fled the country for Iran.

The official Zionist organization that had started its activities in Iraq in 1920 and renewed them in 1941, increased its efforts after the end of World War II, when the dimensions of the Holocaust became known. It viewed the Jewish community as a potential source of immigration to Israel.

Emissaries from Israel discovered that before 1947, Iraqi Jews were generally not oriented toward aliyah. However, the UN decision in 1947 to partition Palestine led to a rise of Arab nationalism among Iraqis who associated all Jews with Zionism. As a result, the Zionist movement became more active.

In early 1949, in Amman, the prime ministers of Iraq and Jordan held a meeting in the presence of the British ambassador. The Iraqi prime minister suggested that "the Jews of Iraq be loaded on military trucks guarded by armored cars and taken to the Iraqi-Jordanian borders."

In July of that year the prime minister of Iraq suggested an exchange of populations by transferring the Jews of Iraq to Israel and allowing the Arabs of Israel to live in Iraq.

Fifty years ago last month, the Israeli minister of police, Bechor Shitreet, also proposed "a transfer" between Iraqi Jews and Arab refugees.

Prime minister David Ben-Gurion and foreign minister Moshe Sharett were adamant in refusing to discuss the idea. They were both well aware of the hefty price Iraq would demand in reaching any agreement.

In March 1950, unexpectedly, the Iraqi government passed a law allowing Jews to renounce their Iraqi citizenship and leave the country. The law was to remain in effect for one year and carried no stipulation concerning personal property.

A month after that law was passed, Ben-Gurion and Sharett proposed a plan of their own as a first attempt to recover Jewish assets from Iraq.

Israel was willing to examine the possibility of exchanging Arab property in Israel which had not been abandoned, for the property of Jews in Iraq. Their proposal related only to Iraq, not to any other Arab country, and only with respect to property that had not been abandoned by the Israeli Arabs.

According to Prof. Yehuda Shenhav of Tel Aviv University, in his book The Truth About Jewish Assets in Iraq, the advisor to Ben-Gurion's office for land and border affairs wrote to the prime minister, the foreign minister and the treasury minister that "...as a first measure, I would instruct our representatives in Paris to establish contact with members of the Iraqi Jewish community in order to convince them to stop selling their assets at reduced prices, and to signal that there is a chance they will be able to obtain a higher price."

In January 1951, only seven weeks before the Iraqi law was to expire, 35,000 Jews had forfeited their Iraqi citizenship but only 23,345 had actually departed the country; another 62,000 had registered to leave. The delays in enabling their exit, ironically, were caused not by Iraq but by the quota system in use at that time by the Jewish Agency.

Only after the Iraqi prime minister threatened to transfer the denationalized Jews in military trucks across the border to Jordan and Kuwait, did the pace of the airlift increase dramatically. The Iraqis even dropped their earlier demand that the departing Jews be flown to Israel through Cyprus.

During the last seven weeks of the law, 30,000 Jews registered to leave.

Israel was thus forced to respond to the Iraqi actions. Some Iraqi Jews in Israel called on the government to impound Arab assets in Israel and distribute them to the arriving Iraqi Jews.

According to Shenhav, Sharett proposed the following solution: "We declare that the entire subject of Iraqi Jewish assets will be taken into consideration in the final settlement, in determining compensation for the Palestinians.

"Since we have not yet abandoned the principle of paying compensation [to the Arabs], we will now say that the value of the Iraqi assets will be deducted from them."

Imaginative as the solution was, Sharett's idea did not satisfy those people who were clamoring for the government to help the Iraqi Jews. They continued to press for tangible measures to ease the incoming Iraqis' plight.

"By expropriating the assets of tens of thousands of Jews who immigrated to Israel," Sharett said in a speech before the Knesset on March 19, "the Iraqi government has incurred a debt to the State of Israel. Such a debt already exists between Israel and the Arab world, and that is the debt of compensation to those Arabs who left Israeli territory and abandoned their property... The action now taken by the Iraqi kingdom...compels us to link the two debts... The value of the Iraqi Jewish assets that were expropriated will be taken into consideration when calculating the compensation we commit to pay Arabs who abandoned their property in Israel."

During the debate that followed Sharett's speech, Knesset members took turns denouncing Baghdad's action. Meir Argov of Mapai said that "Israel had been willing to do its share for the refugees, but now, after this robbery of Iraqi Jews, Israel is released from its obligation."

The Knesset ultimately approved the government's position on the issue of Jewish Iraqi property. Israeli policy was to link compensation for abandoned Arab property with compensation for the confiscated Iraqi Jewish property.

The effect of the Israeli policy linking the two "debts" was to treat Iraqi Jewish property as a national rather than a personal possession. In essence, therefore, that property was expropriated twice: once by Iraq and then again, by Israel.

Because Israel admitted a "debt" owing to the Arabs, the government's decision actually satisfied the Iraqi Jews' demands for a concrete response to Baghdad, and kindled hopes for speedy restitution.

Some Jewish organizations in Israel called on Israel to implement its decision immediately. Iraqi Jews clearly believed they would receive compensation from Arab assets held by the trusteeship holding the property of the Arabs who had fled.

Shenhav points out that while lower-level government officials gave assurances that "the fate of Iraqi Jewish assets is a constant concern for the government of Israel," upper echelon officials were acting differently.

For example, a memorandum from the foreign ministry to the Prime Minister's Office stated: "...the frozen Iraqi Jewish assets may be registered, but their sole purpose will be to deduct the value of the frozen Iraqi Jewish assets [from the value of potential compensation to Arabs]." Israel estimated the value then to be worth $450 million.

The policy provided a golden opportunity to free Israel from Arab claims for compensation.

The foreign ministry objected to the creation of a special office to oversee the registration of claims against Iraq for assets left behind. Sharett insisted that "the value of the Jewish assets impounded by Iraq would be tallied when the question of compensation [to the Arabs who fled] comes up for discussion. That has yet to happen, and there is no telling when it will."

In the summer of 1951, I attended a meeting where Sharett, in very carefully chosen words, said: "Israel will see to it that every cent of the Iraqi Jewish assets will be accounted for." But he did not elaborate.

In 1955, a public committee was set up in Israel to register the claims of Iraqi Jewish immigrants. The committee completed its work in December 1956, and submitted its final report to the Foreign Ministry. There it has remained ever since.

From Israel's point of view the linkage policy was a success. Israel succeeded in establishing a connection between the demands of two distinct communities: the Iraqi Jewish community and the Arabs who fled Israel after its creation. Thus far, it has freed itself from answering both claims.

After the expropriation by the government of Iraq of personal Jewish assets, the government of Israel nationalized those very same assets. Proof of that nationalization can be found in the Israel State Archives, in the files labeled "Defence of Israeli Assets."

A well-kept secret

Whenever the government, on any level, does something that concerns many people, we are sure to hear about it. The media takes it up and a public discussion ensues. Most of the time, that will be the end of the matter. Governments move slowly, bureaucrats try to protect their turf, and elected officials need time to evaluate how voters will judge their performance or non-performance.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But what happens when an individual feels wronged by any branch of government? Letters may be exchanged, personal visits may be made, and most likely, what bureaucrats and politicians have decided will stand.

So, what happens when your complaint against some government action or non-action is passed over? Will you be suing or let it ride? Suing is expensive and you may be advised that the chances of reversing the government's decisions are small. You feel unprotected and wronged.

But that need not be the end of it, though unfortunately the majority of people in Ontario and six other provinces are unaware that each person has still another recourse.

Everyone can appeal to the provincial ombudsman. In Ontario this is Roberta Jamieson, who has held her post with great distinction for several years. To my mind she is one of the most important public servants we have, yet she and her office are widely unknown – in effect she is a well-kept secret.

The word ombudsman comes to us from Scandinavia, where the office of public protector of individual rights first gained a foothold. Ontario established the office some 25 years ago and has housed it in an impressive building at the southeast corner of Avenue Road and Bloor Street in Toronto. The ombudsman will take up any personal complaint against one's own provincial decision and one will be advised what comes of the enquiry.

Though Ontario has had an ombudsman for almost a quarter century, the province was a latecomer in this venture. Even then it would not have happened at all, had it not been for Vernon Singer, a longtime Jewish MPP, who introduced a private member's bill to establish the ombudsman's position and persisted in doing so for 10 consecutive sessions of the legislature. Six other provincial governments had already created such a mandate, and finally Ontario joined them. Singer has benefited all of us. Predecessors to Jamieson in the office of the ombudsman were Arthur Maloney, Justice Donald De Morand and Dr. Daniel Hill.

The very existence of an ombudsman is helpful in tempering the potential for arbitrary government decisions. Officials and politicians know that the ombudsman may be watching. No one likes to be asked uncomfortable questions. When the ombudsman takes up an enquiry, officials are bound to listen and in most cases matters are clarified and misunderstandings are untangled.

Therein lies the ombudsman's power – not in the kind of persecutorial activity a la Kenneth Starr in the United States. The office is a splendid guarantee of democratic access to equal treatment for all citizens, who are fortunate enough to live in a province that has an ombudsman.

What price life in Israel

Consider the plight of consumers in Israel. It's not enough that they must pay outrageously high income taxes every year. Or that they must pay steep municipal taxes. Or that they must pay a 17 percent value added tax on virtually everything they buy. Or that service is often adversarial and workmanship shoddy. All that is nothing next to the fact that's they're taken to the cleaners every day.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Granted, in every country, people are always moaning about prices. But in Israel, where businesses so often milk their customers through hugely inflated prices, the grievance is real. To spend money here is to submit frequently to legalized robbery. If this strikes you as overly harsh, you obviously have never been to Israel.

The world has long accused the Jewish state of many things – both real and imagined – but never of being a bargain for its inhabitants. Talk is cheap here but nothing else is, except maybe pita bread.

With unjustifiably high prices the norm in most spheres of daily life, it's hard not to feel that Israel is one big rip-off. No one dismisses the need to make a profit, but shameless price gouging is something else altogether. In its recent annual report on the Israeli economy, the Jerusalem-based Institute For Advanced Strategic and Political Studies concluded, "All sectors in Israel operate on the principle: Take whatever you can get."

And it's amazing what they can get. Or maybe it's not, given that most Israelis show no resistance to overpriced products or services. It's as if people accept this as an inevitable part of Israeli life, like oppressively hot summers, homicidal drivers and government coalition crises.

All day long, it's a constant assault on the pocketbook. Everywhere you turn, you're hit with exorbitant prices – and I'm not talking about imported luxuries. Take that box of cereal on the breakfast table. Forget about foreign brands like Kellogs, Post and Quaker for which you pay an average of $8 a box (all prices in Canadian dollars). More modest tastes set you back $6.50 for a 500-gram box of a locally made equivalent.

Speaking of food, going to a decent restaurant as a family costs a king's ransom. As a result, when you eat out, fast food – as in most places around the world – is usually the most economic (if not the healthiest) option. How's this for economics? At pizza joints in Jerusalem, a simple take-away slice with no toppings will set you back close to $3!

How about a hamburger? At McDonald's, a Big Mac costs $5.15 without fries. At its local counterpart, Burger Ranch, a similar hamburger goes for $5.50.

Snack time and the urge for ice cream strikes. No, not Haagen-Dazs or Ben & Jerry's or that gourmet stuff from Italy with the fancy wrapping and unpronounceable name. We're talking strictly domestic brands – at $3.10 for two scoops in a regular cone. Or perhaps instead you prefer a little treat at Dunkin Donuts, where a donut costs $1.50.

The difference in most prices between Israel and North America is nothing short of staggering. The comparison shows Israeli business in an even worse light, given that the income of the average western consumer is considerably higher than that of his/her Israeli counterpart.

Take Head & Shoulders shampoo: $6.50 a bottle. Or deodorant stick: $9.30. Or a pack of 10 Gillette Sensor razor blades: $20. Or a four-pack of Duracell AA batteries: $12. Or a CD of a local singer or rock band: $23. The list is endless. Feel like going to a movie? That'll be $9 please, without the popcorn. What about a cup of coffee at the local cafe? Figure on $3 before the tip.

OK, let's forget about such frivolous distractions of modern life and concentrate instead on more substantial things – like a place to live. In Jerusalem or Tel Aviv, count on $600 to $700 per month to rent an ordinary unfurnished one-bedroom apartment, or around $200,000 if it's for sale – and that's at a time when the real estate market is in a slump!

Yet, despite the high cost of living, Israelis spend like there's no tomorrow. And that seems to be the rationale of businessmen charging high prices, determined to make a fast buck for fear tomorrow may be interrupted by the next national calamity.

For most Israelis, it all adds up to one hefty bill and a constant overdraft at the bank. Unfortunately, that seems to be the price for living in the world's only Jewish country.

Exposing the big lie

In the six years since the signing of the Oslo agreement, the Palestinian propaganda war against Israel has continued, and even accelerated. The most blatant expression of this process is the emphasis on the claimed "right of return" for Palestinian refugees.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In Arab mythology, the refugee problem was created in 1948, when the colonialist Jews "expelled" the Palestinians from their villages and cities. Later, in 1967, they were joined by another wave who, although perhaps not "expelled" in a physical sense, were psychologically traumatized into leaving, or so they claim. These refugees and their offspring (two or three generations, and numbering as many as 3.5 million) are now living in Lebanon, Jordan, and Syria. Buttressed by the repetition of the myths, they continue to wait for the day when they will be able to exercise their "right of return."

This demand, which was made already during the cease-fire talks with Israel following the war in 1948, was consistently rejected by Israeli leaders and the public at large. At the time, Ben-Gurion recognized that the insistence that Israel accept millions of Arabs was another attempt at destroying the Jewish State. During the first few years of Israel's existence, over one million Jews were expelled from Arab lands, and the result was a population exchange. Israel welcomed and absorbed the Jewish refugees, while the Arab states kept the Palestinians in camps, isolated and alienated, in order to keep the hatred of Israel festering. Nothing has changed since then, both in terms of Arab demands, and the Israeli response.

However, what has changed in the past 50 years is the degree to which the Arabs have succeeded in gaining acceptance for their myths. The basic facts, beginning with the Arab rejection of the UN partition resolution in 1947 (in contrast to the Zionists, who accepted it) followed by the campaign of terror, and then the combined invasion of Israel in May 1948, have all been ignored. These were the real causes of the Palestinian exodus, aided by the exhortations of their own leaders, who urged them to leave "for a few days," so that the Arab armies could "push the Jews into the sea" without interference.

There are many reasons for the success of the Arab mythology. In part, this is a reflection of Israel's success, and the degree to which the Palestinians are seen as the weaker party. Academics and journalists (the "public opinion elite") have a natural sympathy for underdogs, even when they bring disaster on themselves and tragedy to their neighbors.

The technique of "the big lie" has also helped to spread the myths. As the Nazis showed, the consistent repetition of any claim, no matter how ludicrous, eventually gains acceptance. (Among the Arab intellectuals who are not Holocaust deniers, many make the odious comparison between the refugees and Jewish victims of the Nazis.) With millions of Palestinians and Arabs repeating their "big lie," and backed by petrodollars to buy newspapers, mass media outlets, public relations firms, and university departments, the process is understandable. Edward Said has been one of the major authors of the myth of Palestinian victimization. Said was born in Jerusalem, and became a well-known and much admired professor of English and Comparative Literature at Columbia University, in New York. As a displaced Palestinian who was "forcibly evicted" with his family, from his "beautiful house" in the Jerusalem's Talbiah neighborhood, Said became an articulate spokesman for Palestinians.

For decades, he peddled his story, embellishing it as he went along, gaining fame, acclaim, and sympathy in the process.

A few years ago, Justus Weiner, an Israeli researcher specializing in legal aspects of the Palestinian-Israeli negotiations, accidentally uncovered some apparent inconsistencies in Said's story. Weiner began to verify the details published in Said's autobiographical articles, books, and interviews. After the systematic investigation of archives, as well as hundreds of interviews, Weiner demonstrated that much of Said's story is a fabrication. Although claiming to be a Palestinian, his family lived in Cairo (his mother was Lebanese) and visited cousins from time to time in Jerusalem. The records of the school he claimed to attend did include his name, but he also appeared on the rolls of the elite schools of Cairo during this period. Despite the claims of refugee status, his family returned to Cairo months before the fighting in Jerusalem started. In exacting details, Weiner exposed Said as a fraud. This story of the most articulate exponent of Palestinian victimization is symbolic of the entire campaign to force Israel to accept responsibility for "crimes" it did not commit. If the peace process is to have any meaning, these efforts to rewrite history and to delegitimize Israel must end.

A bumper crop from the film festival

This year's Toronto International Film Festival yielded a bumper crop of movies with Jewish themes, situations and characters. Some of them will be out in commercial release later this year and in 2000.

Shalhav Kirshner on Location

Sunshine, directed by Istvan Szabo and starring Ralph Fiennes, is a riveting three-hour epic about a Hungarian Jewish family tempted by the allure of assimilation and conversion and broken by the dead weight of ethnic nationalism and anti-Semitism.

Ranging across a span of three generations, from the Austro-Hungarian monarchy to the present day, Sunshine is sumptuous and solidly-crafted, charting the uneven trajectory of the Sonnenscheins, down-at-the-heel tavern keepers who amass a fortune, thanks to a secret recipe for a herbal alcoholic drink known as the Taste of Sunshine.

Filmed on location in Hungary, Sunshine unfolds through the medium of three characters, all ably portrayed by Fiennes, who shot to instant stardom with his scalding portrayal of a sadistic Nazi officer in Steven Spielberg's Schindler's List.

Ignatz Sonnenschein, the son of a magnate who warns him that Jews must never try "to climb too high," is an ambitious civil servant whose quest for advancement prompts him to Magyarize his name to Sors. While Ignatz strives for conformity, his brother, Gustave, a doctor, turns to revolutionary politics.

Sporting a rakish mustache, Ignatz's son, Adam, is an Olympic-calibre fencer and vocal Hungarian patriot who converts to Christianity after being advised that assimilation "is the only possible way." But, as Adam belatedly discovers, anti-Semitism runs deep in 1930s. And when the Germans march into Hungary in 1944, his world falls apart in an orgy of unsurpassed hatred and violence.

In the aftermath of World War II, Ivan, Adam's heir, wreaks vengeance on Hungarian fascists as a police official in the Communist regime. Discovering that the workers' state is corrupt, disdainful of justice and freedom and prone to anti-Jewish campaigns disguised as anti-Zionist conspiracies, Ivan rebels. Arrested as a counter-revolutionary after the failed 1956 uprising, Ivan changes his name back to Sonnenschein and quietly reclaims his Jewish identity.

Sunshine, whose historical transitions are skillfully bridged by Fiennes' narration and by documentary footage, is anything but a dry saga of a wealthy clan. Passions boil over, adulterous love affairs explode and messy secrets are exposed.

Expertly directed by Szabo, Sunshine is kaleidoscopic in tone, tilting between optimism and pessimism amid tumultuous political upheavals which transform the face of an empire and a country. It is also fearless, daring to make the point that ordinary Hungarians willingly did the dirty work of the Germans by rounding up, deporting and murdering Jews.

Co-written by Szabo and Israel Horowitz, the screenplay is distinguished by intelligence and sincerity. Yet occasionally, Sunshine is a tad too didactic, such as when a supposedly decent Hungarian army officer describes anti-Semitism as being in "bad taste."

With one or two exceptions, the cast is exceptional. Fiennes carries the picture on his strong shoulders, but Jennifer Ehle (Ingatz's wife), Rosemary Harris (Ivan's grandmother), William Hurt (Ivan's superior), Miriam Margolyes (the family matriarch) and David de Keyser (Ignatz's father) are outstanding as well. Molly Parker (Adam's wife) is the weak link in the chain.

The Girl of Your Dreams, a delicious farce by Spanish director Fernando Trueba, takes place in 1938. As the civil war in Spain rages, a group of filmmakers sympathetic to General Francisco Franco fly off to make a movie in Berlin, glad to be leaving the chaos of Madrid behind them.

Inevitably, they clash with their German collaborators. Temperament is part of the problem. The Germans are arrogant, cold and racist, while the Spaniards are easy-going and humane. Their disagreements, revolving mainly around production values, are exacerbated by the crude behavior of a gay, anti-Semitic German actor, by the Nazi treatment of Jews, and by the sheer effrontery of Josef Goebbels. The repugnant skirt-chasing German propaganda minister threatens to pull the plug on the film unless his insatiable sexual demands are met.

Derisively referred to as Go-Balls, he is attracted to Macarena Granada, a beautiful, dark-eyed actresses who rejects his laughable and cloying romantic advances. Repelled by his appearance and his anti-Semitism, she saves her considerable charms for Leo, a Russian-Jewish extra recruited from a concentration camp.

Hilarious in places, and always droll, The Girl of Your Dreams careers from one comedic situation to another, sweeping up viewers in its mirthful wake. There are, to be sure, serious moments. A pogrom flares and a German waiter bellows, "No Jews allowed in the dining room!" But incredibly enough, The Girl of Your Dreams is never tasteless, and a talented ensemble of actors gives it a stamp of authenticity.

Errol Morris' fascinating documentary, Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter, Jr., is a cautionary tale of a gullible mouse of a man who destroyed himself by self-deception, vanity and a need for recognition.

In 1988, Ernst Zundel, the German-born, Toronto-based neo-Nazi on trial for publishing false information about the Holocaust, commissioned Leuchter, a self-styled technician of death, to conduct a forensic investigation into the use of poison gas at Auschwitz. He turned to Leuchter, an engineer from Massachusetts, because he was an authority on execution systems: gas chambers, electric chairs and so on. If Leuchter could prove that gassings never occurred in Auschwitz, Zundel might be vindicated as a Holocaust denier.

Ralph Fiennes

Travelling to Poland with his new bride, Leuchter illegally took brick and mortar samples from an "alleged" gas chamber to determine whether they contained traces of cyanide. Leuchter had them examined by a lab, and tests apparently found no cyanide in the samples. Zundel was beside himself with joy, but the judge ruled that Leuchter's evidence was merely information.

In a further development, the chemist whose lab had conducted the test found it invalid scientifically. And Robert Jan Van Pelt, the author of an exhaustive history of Auschwitz, pointed out that Leuchter had neglected to delve into the camp's archives, which conclusively proved that gas chambers had indeed been used in Auschwitz. Despite these findings, Leuchter foolishly continued to consort with Holocaust revisionists, like David Irving, who admired him.

Leuchter's innocent foray into the Holocaust denial was disastrous, ruining his career and his short-lived marriage. As Morris suggests, Leuchter – an earnest arch naif who denies he is an anti-Semite – can only blame himself for his travails.

An elegy for her Dutch grandparents, who were gassed in Auschwitz, Elida Schogt's Zyklon Portrait links history with memory in a deceptively powerful meditation on Zyklon B, a chemical compound the Nazis transformed from a pesticide to a genocidal weapon.

Part of the festival's Perspective Canada series, Zyklon Portrait skillfully combines archival footage, home movies, underwater photography and hand-painted imagery. It is a film which penetrates your pores.

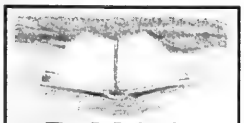
Remembering God



Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI BARRY GELMAN

What would be the consequences if you forgot about God? It seems that many people in the world today are living their lives without feeling that God speaks to them. They claim they believe, yet they don't let this interfere with their business or social interactions.

Lost in the fanfare of the creation story is an episode that teaches us an important contemporary lesson. In Genesis 4:26, we read that in the generation of Enosh, "men began to proclaim the name of God."

Apparently, in that generation, many had forgotten about the existence of God, and in order to combat the phenomenon, certain people began proclaiming His name. It seems that they did the correct thing in attempting to infuse the world with the name of the Divine.

But the commentator, Malbim, focuses on the particular shortcoming of that generation. The key to understanding the verse is the specific term used for God. The Malbim says that the word they use for God's name recognizes Him solely as the origin and first cause of the world.

That generation saw God exclusively as the Creator, the powerful God who made order out of chaos and light out of darkness, who made the land, the sea and the stars. Yet this term for God does not incorporate the fact that God takes an active, everyday, role in the world he created. For the people of that generation, God played no active role in their life. They said that they believed in God, but He was not a God that entered their everyday lives and souls.

What is tragic about this approach is that belief in such a God as theirs can lead to loneliness.

Judaism challenges us to understand God as grand and transcendent, while at the same time understanding that His role in our lives is an active one.

The importance of challenging ourselves to have a personal relationship with God beyond a recognition of His omnipotence is echoed in in the first blessing of the Amidah. There, we refer to God as the God of our forefathers, God of Abraham, God of Isaac and God of Jacob.

Commentators on the siddur ask why the term God must be attached to each forefather. Why not simply say the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob? One can ask another question as to why the forefathers need to be mentioned by name at all if the blessing already includes the phrase "God of our forefathers."

The answer can help us understand what it means to feel that God is part of your life. Each of the forefathers had his own relationship with God. Abraham was the first person to arrive at an intellect-based faith, and apparently had a full life; Isaac was willing to give up his life for God; and Jacob was able to maintain faith in God despite terrible hardship and misfortune. Each forefather had his personal relationship and faith "agreement" with God that was very much dictated by his life story.

Following the mention of the generation of Enosh, details of the generations from Adam and Eve to Noah and the generation of the flood are spelled out. Each of these generations experienced tragedy.

Maybe it was the failure to recognize that one's relationship with God must be not only one of awe, but also one of individual connection, that led to corruption and depravity.

As we begin the cycle of reading the Torah once again, may we all be blessed with the ability to meet the challenge of developing our personal relationship with the Almighty. Only then will we feel the awe of the power of God as our ruler, while at the same time experiencing the love of God as our parent, friend and beloved.

Y2K and the Jews

The Jewish Highway

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

By now, you've heard the warnings. A glitch in computers could cause havoc around the world on the evening of Dec. 31, 1999.

Today, the Y2K bug from a Jewish perspective.

As in the general media, you can find a perspective ranging from deep concern to a feeling that the entire subject has been overblown. Jonathan Libber says it is impossible to know what disruption may occur, but he does have some cautionary advice, such as having on hand ample firewood, bottled water and a battery-powered transistor radio [http://www.y2kosher.com/y2kprep2.htm]. He also suggests that should disruptions occur and you are not able to get to work, this would be an ideal time to catch up on Torah learning, organize classes and plan how you can help your neighbors.

Rabbi Arthur Waskow draws a parallel between a famous story in the Torah and the Y2K bug [http://www.jewishaz.com/1998b/981030/2000.shtml]. The story of the Tower of Babel "describes what happens when humanity becomes so arrogant as to use a 'universal language' to 'storm heaven.' Today, our universal language is the 0-1-0-0-1-1-0-1-0-0-0-0-1 of the computer, and we have used it to make the whole human race dependent on a single technology. Suddenly we have realized how flawed that technology is." He suggests that this would be the ideal time to rebuild our ties to our community and rethink our "societal addictions" to the computer.

Waskow is extremely concerned by the threat posed by the Y2K and his site has articles such as Checklist to Prepare for Y2K, From Yom Kippur to Y2K: A Jewish Response, and When Shabbat Meets Millennium [http://www.shalomctr.org/html/community.html].

On the other hand, when asked about the Y2K bug and the Jews, Ohr Somayach's Ask the Rabbi site takes a very different perspective [http://www.ohr.org.il/ask/ask227.htm#Q1]. "The Jewish people have survived for 3,500 years and we have experienced much worse than the Y2K bug. I am a Jew living in Jerusalem (a miracle in and of itself), son of a Holocaust survivor (another miracle) actively teaching Judaism to thousands of Jews around the world (another miracle). The Torah guarantees that there will always be Jews around observing, studying and teaching Judaism – the only thing that you have to worry about is will you be one of them?"

If you decide that you want to hunker in a bunker on the night of Dec. 31, you can do so in style. A company called Y2Kosher.com will sell you ready-to-eat glatt kosher meals (with a shelf life of five years) [http://www.y2kosher.com].

During those years, you can feast on Chicken and Noodles or Old World Stew. Or you can splurge on the "fully Y2K compliant Shabbat meal in a basket" that includes grape juice, candles, gefilte fish and "Bible bread, the original fast food of the Exodus." Finally, there's matzah, guaranteed to work in the year 2000.

JEWISH EDUCATION

Hunger for spiritual growth

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

In his wonderful story, The Hunger Artist, Franz Kafka tells of a man who fasts for a living. He is able to go weeks at a stretch without food, and does so without any great effort. At the conclusion of the story, as the hunger artist is dying, he is asked to reveal his secret. How is it that he could defy the need to eat for such long periods of time? He answers very simply, "I could never find the food I liked."

Everyone I know is hungry. It is a rumbling that they feel not in their stomachs but in their hearts and souls. Despite the endless carnival of pleasures available to a contemporary person, a vague but very strong sense of dissatisfaction endures. We "cannot find the food we like." A feeling that is hard to articulate remains after the work day is over, the vacation is a memory, the movie has faded to black.

If the feeling were a question, it might be: What do I really want out of my life? Why is it hard to get filled up inside? Why do I distract myself a lot with games? movies? food? If I stop running, cease my fast pace, what will I find? Does my life have purpose? Where do I belong? We are desperate to find the food, the nourishment which will bring us joy, meaning, and inner stillness.

This hunger for spiritual growth is true on a universal level, but perhaps has been felt most acutely in modern life by many Jews. In my work as a Jewish educator, both of high school students and adults, and as a leader of a weekly prayer service, I have been met constantly with the complaint that Judaism is filled with odd rules and is anti-spiritual. The common perception among a great number of Jewish young people is that:

- God is absent from the world, or certainly from their world.
- Judaism is carried out by a small remnant of faithful who live by an outdated and overly detailed set of laws.
- Judaism does not address people and their deepest gut level issues — doubt and faith, self-worth and purposefulness, sexual integrity and romantic unreadiness, raising children in the dizzying modern world, emotional buoyancy, the desire for connection with others and with what is highest.
- Spirituality is a term of the New Age and has little to do with organized religion.
- To be practical is to think about making a living rather than learning how to live.

Our embarrassment at the word God, our squeamishness when it comes to prayer, our inability to focus in on what is real and not a distraction – these are but some of the issues that severely test our ability to listen to Judaism's message in this generation. And whatever we fail to hear inevitably leads to "deafness" in our children. The greatest challenge we face is to recognize that the quest for enlightenment is not a clichéd creation of the media, but a gift to ourselves.

Yitzhak Rabin was filled with admiration. He wrote, "The Jews of Syria who were rescued and the State of Israel owe you so much, and will never be able to reward you as you deserve ... the State of Israel salutes you."

Israel's statehood in 1948, placed the lives of 5,000 Syrian Jews – the remnants of a once much larger community – in jeopardy. They were not allowed to emigrate, became pawns in bargaining negotiations, and suffered multiple setbacks.

Their financial, social and religious institutions were tightly controlled. The Muhabarat, the feared Syrian security police, was everywhere, and they designated a special section to deal with Jewish affairs.

Treated as scapegoats, Jews were humiliated, their property confiscated and destroyed. Those caught trying to escape were imprisoned and tortured. To travel abroad a Jew had to pay an exorbitant bond and leave behind family members as hostages.

There were brief, unexpected periods when the government, perhaps as the result of outside pressure, allowed Jews to travel abroad without restriction. This was tantamount to "escape" for Jews ready to leave. In 1992, approximately 2,800 Jews took advantage of this unusual opportunity. Then just as suddenly, the gates clanged shut again.

Why did Sudbury-born Judy, an unaggressive music teacher, become intensely involved in the cause of Syrian Jewry?

Was it the inspiration and exhortations of Rabbi Meir Kahane, the dynamic and charismatic leader of the Jewish Defense League? Was it Israel's dramatic victory in the 1967 Six Day War?

Answering the question in 1986, she explained that Jews everywhere are bound by a common historical thread. To deny the plight of Syrian Jews would be to deny her own past and her people's past.

After much effort Feld Carr established phone linkage with Rabbi Ibraham Hamri of Damascus and was permitted to send him books and religious articles. She also established contact with businessmen who travelled from Syria to Western countries.

When her husband died of a sudden heart attack Feld Carr established a fund in his memory, the money to be used on behalf of Syrian Jews.

With the help of her second husband Donald Carr, and a coterie of loyal friends and workers, Feld Carr engaged in clandestine, often dangerous, cloak-and-dagger activities – coded messages, bribery, fake cemetery monuments and secret meetings.

She castigated Canadian Jewish Congress and other organizations as timid and unimaginative, passive believers in behind the scenes diplomacies that didn't work.

At the time of her father's death she was involved in a delicate operation to save a Syrian family. She frantically put together the necessary money and handed the envelope to a courier just as her family was about to enter the funeral limousine.

On the last day of the shiva the phone rang. As soon as she answered, the voice on the other end said, "The commodity is out." A mother and five of her children were free.

Eventually, she realized the Jews could be purchased. She had to figure out, according to Troper, whom the Syrians "might be willing to sell, for what price, and who had the final authority to close a deal. As often as not there was haggling. How much for a child? For a sickly old man? For a single young woman? For a whole family?"

In time, the Muhabarat undoubtedly knew of her activities. Why didn't they stop her? One can only conjecture that officials were reluctant to stop the flow of cash which many must have regarded "not as graft but as accepted perk of office."

One of Feld Carr's final accomplishments was to arrange for the smuggling out of Syria of a precious Keter – an exquisitely preserved 14th-century manuscript of the Hebrew Scriptures. It now rests in the National Library in Jerusalem.

Harold Troper is a well-known author of many books and a professor at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, University of Toronto.

The Ransomed of God combines meticulous research with a gripping and unforgettable story of an indomitable woman and her remarkable achievements.

The Talmud teaches that to save one life is to save the entire world. Judy Feld Carr has saved the world many and many times over.

New Age speaker to talk at U of T's Hart House

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — David Icke was allowed to enter Canada, and he gave two talks over the weekend in Ottawa, despite efforts by Canadian Jewish Congress, the Vaad Ha' Ir of Ottawa, the Green party of Ontario and B'nai Brith Canada.

Icke is the controversial British New Age speaker whose writings carry disturbing and bizarre echoes of the anti-Semitic tome, Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

He was also scheduled to speak this week at Hart House Theatre in Toronto and Windsor Casino. His talk at the latter venue was cancelled following contact by concerned Jewish groups.

In Ottawa, as well, Icke's talk was cancelled by at least four different host venues after they learned who he was, said Stacia Benovitch of the Vaad Ha'Ir. He eventually spoke at a CEGEP in Hull, Que. An estimated 35 to 50 people attended the Sunday talk.

Concerned Jewish organizations – and Green party representatives, who are endeavoring to dissociate themselves from Icke, a former Green party member in Britain – had contacted event organizers, host sites, police hate crime units and Immigration authorities regarding their concerns.

Thus far, the only place in Ontario that appears to be willing to allow Icke to speak is Hart House, said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

"We are disappointed," said Farber. "We have asked the University of Toronto at least to provide a basis to monitor the speech to ensure that none of his anti-Semitic material is sold, and to ensure that he doesn't say anything that might be in contravention of anti-hate laws."

A representative of Sumari Seminars, which organized the Ottawa-area presentation as well as the two scheduled for this week in Toronto and Windsor, denied that Icke is anti-Semitic in a letter to Farber.

"Nowhere in his books nor in person that we know of has he stated that Jewish people are to be 'hated,' to be 'feared,' to be 'annihilated,' "wrote the representative, identified only as Susan.

Icke's books have been pulled from Indigo, following contact by Congress, said Farber.

"I hope the next time the Canadian authorities use their discretion not to let him in," said Rubin Friedman, Ottawa-based director of government relations for B'nai Brith Canada.

Icke's lectures cancelled in Ottawa

Friedman, along with Richard Warman of the Green party, had urged Immigration officials to bar Icke, not only because of the content of his books, but also on the basis of not having a work permit.

Contrary to Icke's promotional material, he was not a founder of the Green party in Britain, but was removed from the party because of his views, according to Richard Warman, Ottawa-based Green party member.

According to Friedman (immigration officials could not be reached at press time), Icke had to return to the Ottawa airport for some type of immigration hearing on Sunday.

Warman was also disappointed that Immigration let Icke in in the first place. "I kind of felt we handed him over on a silver platter."

Colon cancer walk set for October 24

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last year the second annual Body 'N Soul walk/run for colon cancer research raised $43,000 and this year the goal is $75,000.

"If detected early enough, colon cancer can be cured," said Amy Lerman, co-chair.

The event takes place Oct. 24 at East Don Parkland, on Leslie Avenue just south of Steeles. The public is invited.

Registration fee for the 5-kilometre walk or the 10-kilometre run is $25 on site, beginning at 9:30 a.m. (pre-registration is $20), with refreshments available.

According to Dr. Zane Cohen and Dr. Steven Gallinger of Mt. Sinai Hospital, colo-rectal cancer is the third leading killer in Canada in both men and women.

This year there will be over 16,000 new cases of colo-rectal cancer in Canada and incidence of the disease is increasing steadily, said Lerman.

The money raised goes to Mt. Sinai Hospital's Gastrointestinal Cancer Research Fund.

"Although 50 percent of patients with colo-rectal cancer can be cured of their disease, we are a long way from understanding the specific causes of this common adult cancer," said Gallinger.

Dower to be installed as Temple Sinai's new cantor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Donna Faye Dower, the new cantor at Temple Sinai, isn't sure what the fuss is about.

She may be the first invested cantor in Toronto, she says, but in the United States, she is one of thousands who have been invested as graduates from a cantorial seminary, where they have received specialized training and instruction in Jewish education.

In fact, says Dower, 37, in her 1993 graduating class at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York, there were three men and 17 women.

Dower, originally from Sharon, Mass., started at Temple Sinai on July 1, after six years as a cantor at Temple Emanu-el in Livingston, N.J.

"I am fortunate to come to a city that has so much to offer. Toronto is a wonderful place in which to be Jewish. There is so much going on and so much opportunity to study and learn here."

The temple welcomed her warmly, she says, and she was impressed with the congregants' level of knowledge and commitment.

Dower, whose father is a musician, says she grew up surrounded by Jewish music. "When I was younger, however, it was unheard of for a woman to be a cantor. So although I did study music at the University of Hartford's Hart School of Music, I hadn't planned on being a cantor."

After spending time as a business consultant in California, Australia and Montreal, she decided she wanted to make music her career. "I went home and sang in the choir at my temple – coincidently called Temple Sinai – and spoke to Cantor Robbie Solomon about becoming a cantor. He was very supportive and led me to Cantor Israel Goldstein at Hebrew Union College."

Goldstein will be doing Dower's installation at the temple on Nov. 20.

At the temple, she sings at the Shabbat, festival and holiday services and at funerals and weddings. She also teaches some adult education classes, performs some pastoral duties, works with bnai/bnot mitzvah students and conducts the children's and adults' choir. As well, since the temple has many lay Torah readers, a big part of her job is arranging for people to read the Torah.

Being a cantor, she says, is the perfect career. "Imagine being paid to sing, pray and work with people. It is everything I want to do rolled into one."

She says that as a wife and mother of a 2½-year-old daughter, Molly, she finds it a challenge to juggle all her responsibilities, but "it is no greater challenge than any other working mother.

"What makes it easy is that my husband is tremendously supportive, and Molly feels at home and is always welcomed at the temple."

Ben Steinberg, music director emeritus at Temple Sinai, composer-in-residence and producer of the temple's Musical Legacy series, says that having an invested woman cantor is a fairly new phenomenon here, but it is a very familiar site in Reform and Conservative congregations in the United States.

Donna Faye Dower

"Canadian Jewry tends to be more traditional than American, but this is 1999, and there is no question [that it is about time.]", Steinberg says.

"I've conducted in many places around the world, I've come across many women cantors, and I take great pleasure in working with them. They have taken their place nicely in the religious fabric of our people. They handle their role with great comfort and skill."

Cantor Frankel set to retire from Beth Torah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a man who once held three jobs at a time, Cantor Samuel Frankel is remarkably sanguine about his recent retirement from Beth Torah Synagogue, where he served as cantor for almost a dozen years.

On Oct. 13, Frankel will be honored at a gala dinner at the synagogue.

The 76-year-old cantor is likely better known to many in the Jewish community as a former teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools and principal of its affiliated five-day-a-week Hebrew school, now defunct, which was located at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Prior to working at Beth Torah, he was the longtime co-cantor at Beth Sholom Synagogue, a position he held concurrently with his work in Jewish education.

A native of Lvov, where he served as lead choir boy in his synagogue, Frankel, a lyric tenor, studied voice in Germany after World War II and completed two years of study in Semitic languages at the University of Munich.

He and his father were the only members of their family to survive the war. When Samuel was in his mid-teens, his father, Israel, who had heard disturbing testimony from Jewish refugees, decided it would be in his son's best interest, as the oldest child, to run away to Russia to escape impending Nazi atrocities.

Cantor Samuel Frankel

"At the last moment," recalled Frankel in a recent interview, "my mother decided I wasn't mature enough to go on my own. She wanted my father to accompany me."

The elder Frankel, a merchant who also had rabbinic smichah, ended up in Samarkand, while his son toiled in the Russian rear army in Tashkent.

Frankel senior eventually secured forged papers for his son, who ran away from the army, disguised himself by growing a beard, and joined his father in Tashkent.

He smiles at the distant memory, sitting comfortably in his tidy home decorated with pictures of his three grown children and their families. "Now that I think about it in retrospect, it was terrible. Had they caught me, I would definitely be in prison for life."

The two men, having found no surviving family in Lvov, headed for Germany under the auspices of Berichah, with the intention of immigrating to Palestine. They changed their plans two years later, when they learned they would have to be separated.

"My father wouldn't hear of it," said the cantor.

They immigrated to Toronto in 1948, because they knew there was a community from Pomorzany, hometown of the cantor's grandparents. His grandfather, for whom he was named, had raised money to help fellow townspeople emigrate, and the Frankels still had ties to the community.

In Toronto, the cantor's father served as rabbi at Agudat Achim (the Toronto "Pomorzany Shul") on Markham Street.

Samuel Frankel began his 30-year career as an educator at the Brunswick Ave. location of Associated Hebrew schools. At the same time, he completed his degree in Near Eastern Studies at the University of Toronto, graduating in 1954. Along the way he married Ruth, a Canadian-born woman, who died suddenly last year.

Now he has chosen to retire, and is looking forward to having the freedom to spend more time with his family, travel and study at university again.

His tenure at Beth Torah, where he is now cantor emeritus, has been "very pleasant, very nice," he said "They're nice people. [But] it's time to retire."

FOX PRAISES ASSOCIATED KIDS

Darryl Fox, brother of Terry Fox, paid a visit last week to Associated Hebrew Day Schools' Kamin campus to express his appreciation. The school launched its eighth consecutive Terry Fox Walk and to date, has raised over $76,000 for cancer research, more than any other school in Ontario. [Adina Abramov photo]

Faith sustained survivor during difficult years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO – Sally Eisner has received numerous citations for her outstanding volunteer work, particularly her dedication to speaking to young people about her experiences during the war.

"I am often asked by students if I still believe in God after what I lived through in the Holocaust," says the sprightly grandmother of five.

"I needed faith in God to help me keep going throughout the war and later to raise my son Paul and daughter Judy [Perlov]. We passed on the faith and traditions to our family."

Sitting in her Bathurst Manor home, Eisner is surrounded by a few remnants of her childhood, awards and photographs. She weeps with sadness as she tells of her teenage years, and with joy as she tells of her life in Canada and raising a family.

Born and raised in Zaleszczyki, Poland, near the Romanian border, Sally and her younger brother, Abe, lived a happy and comfortable childhood.

She points to a faded letter framed on her wall. It is the last letter her father Moshe Efraim Barath, an accountant and international champion chess player, sent to his family in New York in 1938.

Written in Yiddish, the letter expresses her father's fears. He writes of the stressful times: "The sky is black for the Jewish people – we all feel that there is trouble in the air."

In 1938, at the age of 16 she met Leon Eisner. The war disrupted their lives when Leon was taken into the Polish army, later the Russian army. While fighting with the Red Army, he was wounded and captured and spent the rest of the war years in a prisoner of war camp.

In a Grade 13 essay written by Alison Joy Eisner, based on a discussion with her grandmother, there are details of Sally's days in the ghetto; the slave labor camps; and of being hidden with her brother by a Polish woman who later asked them to leave after the Nazis came searching for them; of running and hiding, and of Sally's tenacious struggle to survive with her young brother and Leon's young brother, Stan.

Eisner says she never gave up hope and faith in God. "When we were hidden by the Catholic woman, she told me it was Yom Kippur.

"I refused to eat even though food was like diamonds. The woman said to me that 'God is punishing you so severely, and you still believe in God?' She was amazed."

Eisner speaks of the events in July 1943 when they were in a slave labor camp and she and Leon lost their parents and families.

"We heard terrible sounds of shelling and shooting coming from all over. We did not know what was going on."

She was told that the Nazis had surrounded the camp grounds and ordered everyone to dig a mass grave, their own. They were ordered to strip and stand in line. Then they were shot.

That evening, her brother Abe, then 13, was coming back from the fields where he worked. He saw his parents with the others in the large ditch that had become their grave. "They were floating in blood."

Liberated in 1944, Sally and Leon were reunited and married the following year in Czernowitz, Romania.

They had both lost their entire families except for Sally's brother, Abe Barath, and Leon's brother, Stan.

Stan and Abe were brought to Canada in 1948 as orphans by the Canadian government. Sally and Leon came to New York in 1949 to aunts and uncles.

When the Eisners realized that their brothers were going to remain in Canada, they decided to move to Toronto with their 2½-year-old son, Paul (now a successful dentist).

Sally Barath, 16, and Leon Eisner, 20, in Zaleszczyk, Poland in 1939 and (inset) at their 50th wedding anniversary.

'My pain is inside and will never go away'

Her husband's library is filled with Hebrew and Yiddish books. On the coffee table there is a book titled The Ghosts That Haunt Us, which tells of Sally's story of survival in the Tlusten Vermacht camp.

"Nobody can believe the story – I can't believe it myself," she says with a sigh.

"My husband and I observe the yahrzeit of our beloved families on the same day."

Today, Sally Eisner can take pride in her family and her outstanding accomplishments as a volunteer. She has been honored by Co-ordinated Services to the Jewish Elderly (now Circle of Care).

She has received a citation from the Survivors Speakers' Bureau of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, and the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

She says that she gets great satisfaction from speaking to school children. Many send her notes of appreciation. A young girl at a Catholic school wrote, "The most touching part of the exhibit was Sally's story.

"She told us about her struggle with death, her loving brother, and about her parents who died in a labor camp.

"Perhaps the reason why her story was so very touching was because she is a real person, with real feelings and emotions…who can tell us about the evil that existed, and save us from thinking that it never occurred."

Two teachers at Fr. Michael Goetz S.S. in Mississauga wrote, "We realize that speaking to us brings back painful memories, but the reality of it had an impact on our students that they will never forget.

"This enables us, as teachers, …to create a more tolerant attitude toward people and eliminate the prejudice and racism that creates hatred and prevents unity in our community and world!"

Will there ever be complete healing for Sally Eisner?

"I can never be completely healed. My pain is inside and will never go away," she replies. "But maybe by letting the world know what happened to us, it will lighten my pain and turn it into knowledge for others and prevent the horror from happening again."

Eating a 'spiritual quest,' author says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Judi Hollis

TORONTO — Women tend to turn to excesses such as overeating or drinking to fill their inner longings, says a pioneer in the treatment of eating disorders.

Women have to accept the fact that eating is a spiritual quest and that "we have to heal the spirit by going through the body," says therapist Judi Hollis, the author of Hot and Heavy, Finding your Soul Through Food and Sex (Health Communications Inc.).

Hollis is the keynote speaker at UJA Federation's Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation's Evening for Women: Sexuality, Food and Body Image, to be held at the Leah Posluns Theatre 7:30 p.m. on Oct. 25.

Hollis, who opened the first hospital eating disorder unit in the United States, and was responsible for developing addiction treatment programs at hospitals in Los Angeles and New York, told The CJN in a recent telephone interview from New York that having sex is also a spiritual experience.

"To eat or love well, you must pay full attention to the details and be truly alive in the moment.

"To fully enjoy your meal, you must be aware of every nuance. The same is true of sex. There is a direct link between food consciousness and sex consciousness."

In Yiddish, says Hollis – she lost 80 pounds about 25 years ago and has kept it off – essen and fressen are both verbs meaning to eat. "Fressen is used when speaking of animals eating, and essen refers to human consumption.

"Changing how you eat can change your sex life and vice versa. Approaching either of these animal behaviors with focus automatically influences the other."

According to Hollis, "fat is a family affair," and so she has focused on the mother-daughter relationship. "It is important for a girl to individuate and separate from her mother.

"Girls always wanted to be mothers, but they had no sense of their mothers as sexual beings. We turned ourselves [into how we saw our mothers during the day]."

Most dieting programs, she says, spend a lot of time teaching you what to eat. "Our goal, instead, is learning how to eat. You will learn to bring a spiritual aspect to your eating, and then, to your lovemaking."

Intention, she says, is everything. "You will ultimately only eat or make love with intention, [and] that will be a natural result of paying attention.

"By giving yourself this attention now, you will move from a self-destructive, battering relationship with food to a loving, sensual, satisfying affair."

Despite the women's movement, Hollis says, women were not groomed to be sexual.

"We lived in a society where fat women were put down sexually, so they ate instead.

"I encourage my readers to reach for a mate instead of a plate...gluttony keeps you from the life you are supposed to be living."

New Tel Aviv mayor tries to fix growing pains

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ron Huldai

TORONTO — On April 11, 1909, a group of middle-class Jewish settlers from Jaffa gathered amid deserted sand-dunes to celebrate the purchase of five hectares of land.

It was a historic moment, captured in a famous black-and-white photograph emblematic of Zionist endeavors in Palestine.

The sanguine Jews who assembled in that forlorn place intended to build a garden suburb there. Optimistically, they called it Spring Hill, or Tel Aviv.

It was the world's first Hebrew city.

Ninety years on, Tel Aviv, Israel's commercial and cultural hub, is exhibiting serious growing pains.

"There has been a deterioration in our standard of living," said Ron Huldai, Tel Aviv's 10th mayor. He was here last week to raise funds for the Tel Aviv Foundation, a philanthropic organization.

Elected last year on a platform of improving Tel Aviv's quality of life, Huldai has unveiled an ambitious program to cure it of its ailments.

A 55-year-old former combat pilot with four "kills" to his credit, he wants to fix Tel Aviv's sagging infrastructure and preserve its historic neighborhoods.

Tel Aviv, he explained in an interview, is an incredibly lively, pluralistic, live-and-let-live city with a fantastic night life and a great future.

However, it has become less liveable in recent years, he warned. Burdened by congestion, crumbling roads weighed down by far too much traffic and a crying lack of parking facilities, Tel Aviv is bursting at the seams.

A former brigadier-general in the air force who was proclaimed mayor on Dec. 1, 1998, Huldai has huge plans for Tel Aviv.

Having gotten off to a fast start, he has begun to balance the budget after years of deficits, streamlined the work force to make it more efficient, and planted an unprecedented number of trees, 5,000, in a bid to deflect criticism of Tel Aviv as a concrete jungle.

And, in an effort to preserve the character of old Tel Aviv, he plans to ban the construction of skyscrapers and the routing of big buses in certain residential districts.

"We're planning a more organized way of living in Tel Aviv," said Huldai, a friendly, plain-spoken, down-to-earth man who doesn't act like the typical press-the-flesh politician.

Born in Kibbutz Hulda, the son of Polish Jews from Lodz, he is now in the midst of putting the finishing touches to a master plan intended to revitalize Tel Aviv.

"I'm working on issues that will affect the city in 10, 15 years," he observed.

And, he added, he is striving to achieve a balance between public and private interests.

Tel Aviv, with a population of about 400,000, is Israel's second largest city after Jerusalem. But approximately one million commuters stream in every day, greatly taxing its resources.

Like his past immediate predecessors, Roni Milo (1993-98) and Shlomo Lahat (1974-93), Huldai has decided that the key to Tel Aviv's salvation is improved transportation.

Working in league with the national government, Huldai hopes to construct commuter train lines from outlying areas to Tel Aviv, as well as a subway in the city itself.

In his view, commuter trains and a subway line will ease overcrowding and, by definition, promote economic growth.

Yet there is a price to pay for progress. Citing an example, he said that the cost of building just one kilometre of subway track is $150 million (US), no small sum in a security-challenged country like Israel.

For starters, Huldai seeks to build a subway of six to eight kilometres. And if further funds are available, he'll expand the system by about nine kilometres.

Huldai, whose parents made aliyah in 1929 and were both teachers, is a graduate of the U.S. Air Force Air War College. He also holds arts and business administration degrees from the University of Pennsylvania and Auburn University in Alabama.

He flew combat missions during the Six Day War, the War of Attrition, the Yom Kippur War (when he downed one Syrian and three Egyptian MiGs) and the Lebanon War.

Subsequently, he commanded air force bases near Arad and Beersheva.

Retiring from active duty, he entered the private sector as a partner in an international trade company. From 1992 until his election as mayor, he was principal of the Herzliya Gymnasium, the first Hebrew high school in Tel Aviv.

Asked how long he hopes to be mayor, Huldai replied that two five-year terms would be sufficient to complete his agenda.

While in Toronto and Montreal, his previous stopover, Huldai campaigned on behalf of the Tel Aviv Foundation. Its objective is to enhance the city's educational and cultural institutions.

He has no interest in running for national office, even though he managed the Labor party's successful campaign in last May's election.

Huldai, married with three grown children, is convinced that Prime Minister Ehud Barak is serious about making peace with the Palestinians and Syria. But he does not underestimate the difficulties. "There are no miracles. It will take time. We have to live together, and find a win-win formula. In the meantime, Barak is building trust."

Peace, he suggested, cannot be achieved at either Israel's or the Arabs' expense.

Feldmans to be honored for community service

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yitz Feldman will no longer have to live vicariously through his children.

In December, Feldman and his wife Bella, both longtime Zionists, are fulfilling their dream and joining their three children and 15 grandchildren in Israel.

In honor of their aliyah, and in recognition of their years of community service, they will be honored at a tribute dinner on Nov. 11 at Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto.

The dinner will be sponsored jointly by the Board of Jewish Education, Clanton Park Synagogue, Eitz Chaim Schools, Kashruth Council of Toronto, the Mizrachi Organization of Canada and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

According to Offer Isseroff, regional director of Jewish Agency and Israel Aliyah Centre of Canada, the Feldmans are among about 200 Canadian Jews who make aliyah each year.

Some, like the Feldmans, are nearing retirement age and joining their grown children in Israel. Others are unmarried young adults who are looking to start a new life in Israel.

There is a also a group of 35-50 year olds, but "that group usually has children in school here and are immersed in a career, so fewer people of that age make aliyah."

Although events such as terrorist attacks may affect the number of visitors to Israel, says Isseroff, it does not affect aliyah. "Once people make up their mind to go, they usually go."

Feldman is national vice-president of Mizrachi-Hapoel Hamizrachi and chair of the Kashruth Council of Toronto. He has had leadership roles on such boards as Eitz Chaim Schools, Beth Jacob High School for Girls, Canada-Israel Committee and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Feldman, who had polio as a young boy, is now wheelchair-bound. He was instrumental in assuring that an extension to Eitz Chaim Schools on Patricia Avenue was wheelchair accessible.

"My first involvement in the community was with Bnai Akivah, a Zionist youth organization. Then, when my children entered school, I joined a committee at Eitz Chaim. One involvement just snowballed into another – one mitzvah begets another mitzvah."

Now that all three children live in Israel, he says, it's time "all of us are on the same side of the ocean. When we were in Israel for Pesach about two years ago, my grandchildren said that their payment for finding the afikoman should be that we make aliyah."

The Israel Aliyah Centre, says Isseroff, should be the first stop for anyone planning aliyah. "We take them through the whole process; we provide the necessary papers, supply them with an airline ticket and arrange for volunteers from the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel to meet them at the airport."

As well, he says, the centre has names of people who can help olim find apartments, an absorption centre or jobs. We can also arrange meetings here with Israeli experts in fields such as career placement.

"We also question potential olim for their own benefit. Every Jew is entitled to go to Israel, but if I am doing the procedure, I am responsible for that person. I want them to be prepared for what they are undertaking."

Medical information is important, he said, because people may be having treatment here that needs to be continued in Israel. "They have to know about the medical care available to them in Israel.

"We also have to make sure the person is really Jewish. Olim have to prove they are Jewish in Israel, but it is easier to check here, before they leave the country. We want to make their aliyah as easy for them as possible."

Depending on their readiness, Isseroff estimates that olim can be ready to leave anywhere from two to eight weeks from when they approach the office.

Living in Israel, says Feldman, is the culmination of something to which he and his wife have striven for most of their lives. "It is the homeland for Jews, and that is where Jews should live. Because our children are there, we have a double reason for going."

In Toronto, he says, "I had my finger in a lot of pies, and I'm leaving behind a community that I've tried to make better."

VIGIL TO END ANTI-SEMITISM

Fewer than 50 people, including speakers and organizers, turned out recently for an un-advertised rally to end anti-Semitism. The event, held at the Yad Vashem Holocaust monument in Earl Bales Park, featured speakers from communal organizations and a candle-lit vigil. It was held by the National Coalition Building Institute, Canada, in the wake of the yet-unsolved beating of two elderly Jewish men in Toronto in August. [Ron Csillag photo]

Aging parents focus of series

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't feel alone, there is help out there, is the way a Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care staffer summed up the message of a 13-part TV series on TVOntario.

"This series will be most helpful to families who are just beginning to experience the problems of caring for an aging family member," said Sorele Urman, associate director of social work at Baycrest.

The series, Taking Care, started Sept. 30 and will continue each Thursday at 2 p.m., with repeats on Saturday at 4 pm. and Sunday at 5.30 p.m.

It is described by TVOntario as a crash course in looking after an aging parent.

Produced in partnership by TVOntario and Baycrest, the first show introduces viewers to three families who are experiencing the problems the series addresses. One of the families in the opening segment is Jewish.

Each half-hour will include a studio discussion with community and health-care professionals who provide insight and practical information.

Although Take Care is not a call-in show, a hotline number will be given at the end of the program. This number will bring inquiries to a desk at Baycrest.

Hosted by radio personality Mary Ellen Beninger, each program will address a different challenge along the caregiving road, such as identifying the early signs that a relative may need help, strategies for organizing homecare, coping with dementia and shopping for a long-term facility.

Coast to Coast

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

We recently examined the rough and tumble world of Liberal riding nominations. But the last couple of months have also provided Canadians with a glimpse into another dimension of the scabrous life of the partisan politician. We refer to the recent defections of Bill Matthews and Angela Vautour.

The decisions of these two Maritime MPs to bolt their respective caucuses were not unique occurrences in federal politics. David Kilgour crossed the floor to join the Liberals in opposition and was subsequently rewarded with a junior cabinet portfolio for his troubles.

The creation of the Bloc Quebecois saw eight MPs abandon their caucuses and form a new political entity that subsequently served as the Official Opposition.

Followers of Israeli politics have long grown accustomed to seeing some of the most prominent Knesset members switch alliances, withdraw from a government coalition and even establish new parties.

So what is so curious about these two characters?

Well the curiosity relates to the juxtaposition of their choices. Matthews left the Joe Clark Tories to join the governing Liberals. He felt that he could do more for his constituents as a Liberal – especially now, since his friend George Baker had finally made it into cabinet.

Clark fumed (privately) and bemoaned how any individual with integrity could betray his supporters in so self-serving a manner. After all, he won election to the House as a Tory with the backing of 46 percent of the voters in his riding – which was only one percent less than the margin of victory enjoyed by the prime minister himself.

NDP leader, Alexa McDonough was less discreet about her disgust with Angela Vautour's decision to join the Tories. It must have been a very tough pill for Alexa to swallow, made none the easier as she observed a smug Joe Clark standing next to his newest caucus colleague at Vautour's media conference.

Politicians undergo conversions for all sorts of reasons. Some are motivated by principle while others do it to advance their personal ambitions. The real question is why would someone with as much self-professed integrity as Joe Clark accept a defector into his party? Perhaps it isn't so curious a thing after all...just very disappointing.

Rasminsky children donate piano

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

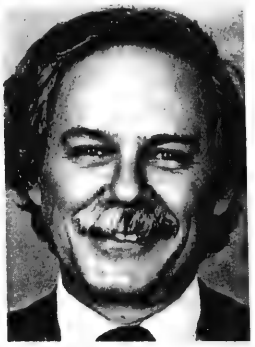
OTTAWA — The children of the former governor of the Bank of Canada, the late Louis Rasminsky, recently donated a piano from the family home to Canada Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF).

The presentation of the piano, made in memory of Rasminsky and his wife Lyla, took place during the CICF's opening meeting at Kinneret, the residence of the ambassador of Israel to Canada, where the piano will remain.

Dr. Norman Barwin, president of CICF, was pleased to accept the gift from Dr. Michael Rasminsky, representing himself and his sister Lola. She was unable to attend.

"The mission of CICF is to bring Israeli culture to Canada and vice versa," said Barwin. "Where would be a better place to have this piano than Kinneret, our little piece of Israel in Canada?"

Evelyn Greenberg



Dr. Michael Rasminsky

Rasminsky, a neurologist who lives in Montreal, and Evelyn Greenberg, a well known Ottawa musician and longtime member of CICF, performed a concert for four hands on the piano.

The Dolly Suite by Gabriel Faure, a suite in six short pieces, delighted the audience. "In the late 19th century, people learned orchestral music by hearing it for four hands," said Rasminsky. "I learned all the orchestral music that way."

He said his family home was located near Kinneret and so he and his sister spent a great deal of time at Kinneret when they were children. "I am very pleased that this piano has come here," he said. "This house has very happy memories for me."

The gift was particularly sentimental for him, he said. "Both my sister and I learned to play the piano on this piano."

"It is very appropriate tonight that this piano, which has been donated by the Rasminsky family, will be standing here in memory of a person for whom we had the greatest respect," said Greenberg.

"Even when he was not well, Louis Rasminsky always supported CICF and we are grateful to Michael and his family for donating the piano."

Orthodox Caucus hopes to 'sensitize' on ethics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A prominent rabbi went to spend Shabbat at the home of a disciple. The family went to a great deal of effort to make everything as proper and as elegant as they could.

Flustered by all the preparations and the excitement, the hostess forgot to cover the challah before Kiddush. The embarrassed host berated her soundly.

"Explain it to me," said the rabbi to his host. "Why are you careful not to insult the dignity and honor of the challah, but it doesn't bother you to insult the dignity and honor of your wife?"

While there may sometimes appear to be a distinction between strict observance of Halachah and what might be termed mentschlichkeit, in fact, the sages have always stressed that compassion, ethical behavior and respect are essential aspects of religious observance.

The forgiveness that Jews pray for on Yom Kippur can only be given, according to tradition, for sins committed against God. Atonement for sins against other people only comes if one asks for – and receives – forgiveness from the injured party.

In 1992, a group of religious leaders and lay men and women in the New York area founded The Orthodox Caucus, an organization designed, as its literature explains, "to sensitize Orthodox Jews to the demands and expectations of Torah and Halachah in matters of ethics and character excellence."

Rabbi Basil Herring, spiritual leader of the Atlantic Beach Jewish Centre, and executive chair of the caucus, told The CJN "there was a general sense that there was a need for a group of men and women to address issues that might arise, in an organized and efficient manner."

While there are organizations that deal with one aspect or another of the issues involved, "we felt there was a need to bring them [the organizations] together in a way that would transcend their individual agendas."

One of the Caucus' first concerns was the plight of the agunah, the woman whose husband refuses to give her a get, a religious divorce.

After a great deal of discussion, Rabbi Mordechai Willig wrote a prenuptial agreement in which a bride and groom agree that if the marriage dissolves, they will abide by the rulings of a mutually acceptable rabbinic court.

Address concerns of women

Rabbi Herring said more than half of the modern Orthodox weddings in the United States use the formulation, which, he said, has received broad-based halachic endorsement.

The caucus is trying to "address responsibly issues and concerns of women," whose needs "must be addressed pro-actively," he said.

Matters being looked into include naming of baby girls; using women's names in prayers where it is halachically proper; and the design of mechitzahs, the physical barriers separating men and women at prayer.

"Women should feel that they can hear, see and participate," he said, adding that the caucus hopes to publish a booklet of acceptable designs.

A rabbinic training program is also available, Rabbi Herring said, to give "talented young rabbis the skills to be dynamic leaders."

Another project is ROVE, Responsible Orthodox Views and Editorials, an e-mail program that gives reasoned and accurate responses to events of the day.

While the major support for the Orthodox Caucus is from the centrist or modern Orthodox, Rabbi Herring said they "make every effort to include any Orthodox leader or individual who sees merit in what we do. We prefer to be inclusive."

The caucus is financially independent, funded by the 150 members of its plenum. Special projects are funded by outside sources, such as individuals, foundations and federations.

One of the organization's major efforts is the Torah Ethics Project, which focuses on "the centrality of ethical and character excellence in our relations with each other and with the world around us, [to] sensitize all Orthodox Jews to the demands and expectations of Torah and Halachah in the realm of ethical and civic virtue."

Topics include Ahavat Yisrael, love of fellow Jews; Shalom Bayit, peace within the home; and Dina D'malchuta Dina, the law of the land must be obeyed.

The Torah Ethics Project functions in a number of communities, including Manhattan, Bergen County, N.J., and greater Boston. Expansion is planned to other communities, including Toronto.

Co-ordinators of the Orthodox Caucus in Toronto are Rabbi Jay and Ilana Kelman. Rabbi Kelman is associate rabbi of Beth Jacob Congregation. Other Torontonians involved include Saul and Mira Koschitzky, Prof. Martin and Ruth Lokshin, Rabbis Chaim Sacknowitz, Moshe Shulman, Pinchas Tessler and Reuven Tradburks, Dr. Aaron Jesin, Jerry Tollinsky, Aaron Weinstock, Reuven Stern and Kurt Rothschild.

The Toronto Torah Ethics Project is the biggest project the Orthodox Caucus has undertaken, Rabbi Kelman said. "It is the first one where we are trying to get the whole community involved."

The project chosen for Toronto is Kevod HaBeriyot, sensitivity to the needs and feelings of others. For three weeks, starting on Shabbat, Oct. 9, there will be projects, programs, guest speakers, sermons, study evenings and discussions in schools, shuls, private homes, organizations and youth groups.

The inaugural speaker will be Rabbi Jacob Schacter, spiritual leader of Manhattan's Jewish Centre and an expert on Halachah and ethics. The event will be held Oct. 10 at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz in Downsview.

Discussion guides, reading lists and other material geared to different age groups are being distributed throughout the community. Topics include a schoolmate who wants to join a game but causes his team to lose, a friend with bad taste in clothes, a non-observant family that moves in next door to an observant one, and a man who refuses to give his wife a get.

One of the sources cited in the Kevod HaBeriyot material is a quote from Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik, which probably sums up the Orthodox Caucus:

"I may attack a certain point of view which I consider false, but I will never attack a person who preaches it…Such a relation is in accord with the concept of kevod haberiyot, for 'beloved is man for he is created in the image of God.'"

For information on the Kevod HaBeriyot Torah Ethics Project or the Orthodox Caucus generally, contact Rabbi Jay or Ilana Kelman, 416-633-5406, or the Orthodox Caucus Web site, www.orthodoxcaucus.org.

Just Between Us

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

רוסיה-צחוק הגורל:

Lord's Prayer banned at Penetanguishene council

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the very few Jewish residents of the northern Ontario town of Penetanguishene is pleased that his fight to have the Lord's Prayer banned at council meetings appears to be over.

And Henry Freitag is taking the accompanying anti-Semitic fallout in stride.

"I got calls saying I'm a Nazi. I got calls saying I'm a Jew. I even had some death threats," Freitag, 70, told The CJN in a phone interview a few days after the Ontario Court of Appeal ruled that reciting the Lord's Prayer at the start of Penetanguishene's council meetings violates religious freedom and is unconstitutional.

In a unanimous 3-0 decision, the court overturned a lower ruling which had said the Lord's Prayer was innocuous and should not be censored.

The higher court disagreed, saying the purpose of reciting the Lord's Prayer was to "impose a Christian moral tone on the deliberations of council," and that everyone is entitled to attend a council meeting without feeling pressure to conform "to the religious practices of the majority."

The court issued an injunction preventing the town from engaging in the ritual, which dates back 100 years.

Last month's decision is a big win for Freitag, who launched his challenge to the prayer because, as a non-Christian, he felt "coerced" to stand and recite it at council meetings, which he attends frequently.

Freitag also argued that the practice discouraged him from running for public office.

"This does not mean he is so fearful that he does not participate," the court stated in its 26-page decision. "He does so, but as a citizen who is singled out as being not part of the majority recognized officially in the proceedings."

Freitag also based his argument on a 1988 Ontario Court of Appeal ruling, which struck down the regulation that forced public classrooms to start the day with the Lord's Prayer.

The court relied on a 1985 ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada that the Lord's Day Act, which prohibited Sunday shopping, was unconstitutional because it effectively forced the observance of the Christian Sabbath.

Freitag, a retired construction worker, said he's still getting some "nasty" mail and calls.

But, he insists, "I didn't win. Canada won."

Freitag's late mother was Jewish, and the two spent several weeks at a Nazi detention centre in Berlin during World War II.

His mother died in a bombing raid, and Freitag spent the rest of the war living as a Christian. He came to Canada in 1956.

The ruling means the custom of beginning town and city council meetings with the Lord's Prayer has more or less ended in Ontario.

The court suggested the town of Penetanguishene follow the lead of the House of Commons, where, since 1994, proceedings have opened with a moment of silence and a non-denominational prayer.

In a statement, Penetanguishene's mayor, John Klug, said he was disappointed with the court ruling.

"Overall, the feeling of the residents in town is one of disappointment," the statement said. "Residents are having a hard time understanding how one person can dictate what they can say or not say."

The town's council is scheduled to meet Oct. 6 to discuss the ruling and decide whether to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Residents donated $8,546 to help the town pay its legal bills. Klug said the town cannot afford further appeals without public assistance.

The mayor added he was heartened by encouragement shown by residents and by mayors of other communities across Canada which recite the Lord's Prayer.

Freitag said there are four of five other Jewish residents of Penetanguishene, which has a population of 8,000. He conceded it's difficult to practise Judaism there, as the nearest Jewish community is in Barrie, about 50 kilometres away.

Exhibit to focus on shul photos

VANCOUVER — An exhibit of photographs of 12 Greater Vancouver and Victoria synagogues and sanctuaries will be shown in the Sidney and Gertrude Zack Gallery at the Jewish Community Centre, Oct. 21 to Nov. 25.

The exhibit is being co-sponsored by the Louis Brier Home and Hospital and the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver.

Award-winning local photographer, Don McGregor, was commissioned to undertake this project, believed to be the first of its kind in Canada.

An opening event, by invitation only, scheduled for Oct. 20, is sponsored by the Louis Brier Auxiliary and is being co-chaired by Ruth Jackson and Rose Parker.

"This art photography exhibit is an important part of the history of the Jewish community in British Columbia and in Canada. We hope everyone will visit this exhibit and view these beautiful works of art," said Lee Simpson, president of the board of trustees of Louis Brier.

All photographs will be for sale. For further information, contact Louis Brier Home and Hospital 604-261-9376.

How to disagree.

Disagree with respect. With dignity. With concern for your adversary's feelings.

Because man was created by God betzelem Elokim, in His image. And therefore expressing anger inappropriately is like attacking God Himself.

Halacha insists you be careful in how you speak to, deal with and even think about each and every human being you meet.

From the bus driver who's late in picking up your kids for school, to the shul officers who never give you an honor.

From supermarket cashiers who move too slowly, to phone solicitors for yeshivot you never even heard of.

Doctors. Secretaries. Bill collectors.

Sanitation workers. Baby-sitters. Lawyers.

Even in Jewish history when murderers were executed, halacha insisted upon death with dignity.

God, after all, gave souls to people regardless of their religion or socio-economic background.

And hurting someone is therefore like hurting yourself.

Even if you passively enjoy the humiliation of others you might be forfeiting your World to Come.

Better to do as halacha recommends– go out of your way to put people at ease.

Tell a bride she's beautiful even if she's not. Tell a dying man he looks radiant.

Compliment the poor man on his new outfit, your overweight friend on how good he looks.

And remember, no matter who we are, or what we look like, we all come from Adam and Eve. And we all deserve the respect that comes with that common origin.

So disagree all you want. But attack the idea. Never the person.

KEVOD HA-BERIYOT כבוד הבריות

Be a better person. Be a better Jew.

New BGU greenhouse aims to change food crop cultivation

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Thanks to a Canadian inventor, Ben-Gurion University (BGU) in Israel will be the first site in the world to have a new concept in greenhouse design that promises to revolutionize the way the world cultivates plants, food crops, and even animal life.

Under this new Closed Ecological Life Support System, or CELSS, a special greenhouse will built in Israel, bearing the names of the honorees of an Oct. 19 BGU dinner in Toronto.

The hope is ultimately to erect such structures all over the world, from the coldest to warmest climates.

The revolutionary idea behind the system, the brainchild of Richard Nelson of Montreal-based Thermactive Environments Inc. and its licencee, Agrispace, is, according to the company, to create an environment "that monitors and intelligently controls daylight, heating, cooling and humidity" in extreme weather conditions in the most cost-efficient way possible.

This new form of greenhouse, whose prototype in Israel will be called the ECOLiving Centre, uses virtually every element in the bio-agricultural and ecological environment – including state-of-the-art materials, waste water and plant photosynthesis – to create a closed system that allows cultivation at a fraction of the usual cost.

The greenhouse is enclosed in a transparent, membrane-covered structure that captures, uses and conserves solar energy without the usual bane of such environments, namely exorbitant heating and cooling costs.

The new system promises to cut these costs by 80 percent.

The key lies in a design that allows heating and cooling materials to be used again and again within the closed system without the structure having to be ventilated at the usual level and without valuable heat or cold being lost to the outdoors. Ventilation will be reduced by 1,000 percent or more.

The building is fully automated, with a thin film of water in the roof panel capturing excess solar gain and holding it as a thermal mass.

Through a complex design in this solar-controlled environment, the thermal mass will be used to heat, cool and control humidity levels, according to need.

One intriguing aspect of the new system is the use of a special generator that produces recyclable "modular bubbles" that eliminate the need for expensive boilers, ventilation and shading systems.

The bubbles, made of liquid foam, circulate within duct-like spaces in the solar panels of the roof and wall system, insulating at a factor R20-30, as well as cooling. Housing made of glass, by comparison, has an R-factor of only one or two.

According to Nelson and one of the system's primary investors, Stephen Vineberg (another major investor is Fred Klein of Montreal), the CELSS system also has other benefits.

The system, they said, can purify and re-use waste water, conserve and recover water transpired by plants, water that would ordinarily be lost using an open ventilation system.

It is this ability of the system to tap into the photosynthesis, the life-force, of plants that may be the most revolutionary aspect of the closed environment system, allowing it to process solar energy, purify water and clean the atmosphere.

"It is very much a 'living system,'" Nelson said.

Vineberg said BGU will be funding the experimental building's structure, research and possible applications.

The closed-system greenhouses are built on a skeleton of lightweight aluminum that is easily transportable to the far reaches of the earth. The technology is applicable to everything from farm animal barns to retail stores to waste water treatment plants to food and flower production greenhouses.

There is a long way to go, however, before the new technology takes over the world.

The initial structure in Israel will be only 5,000 square feet. In the United States and Canada alone, over a billion square feet are used for conventional greenhouses. And greenhouses in general account for only one percent of world food production.

However, Nelson and Vineberg point out the importance of what such "controlled environment structures" could mean for the world and for the ecology of the world of the future."

Sukkah built in Okanagan

OKANAGAN, B.C. — On September 26, children in the Okanagan Jewish community decorated a sukkah with hand-made ornaments and seasonal fruits and vegetables.

The sukkah is a reminder of the temporary dwellings used by the Israelites during 40 years travelling the desert from Egypt to Israel.

The morning began with a service led by Sam Larry, followed by the children decorating the sukkah under the leadership of Sam and Katie Levin.

Burdi gets sentence for promoting hate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

WINDSOR, Ont. — George Burdi, founder of the hate rock band RaHoWa (an acronym for Racial Holy War) and its record label Resistance Records Inc., pleaded guilty and was convicted last week on charges of the willful promotion of hatred.

A one-year conditional sentence, which may be served in the community, prohibits him from involvement with racist causes, the promotion of hatred or animosity toward any racial, ethnic or religious group or the advocation of white supremacy.

"This decision sends a clear message that Canadian society does not take hatred lightly," said Ellen Cole, community relations chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

She noted that CJC would have preferred harsher conditions but is "satisfied by the guilty plea...Mr. Burdi should understand that Canadian Jewish Congress, amongst others, will vigilantly monitor his actions and associations to ensure that he respects the conditions imposed upon him."

In 1995, Burdi was convicted of assault causing bodily harm for kicking a woman in the face following a RaHoWa concert. He was sentenced to one year in prison.

Burdi, 29, has "a very long track record of white supremacy and hate activity," said Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

She would like to see evidence to back up his claim that he is changing his ways, she said.

Heritage Week proclamation rescinded in Fredericton

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A proclamation by Fredericton mayor Walter Brown was rescinded last week following protests by the Atlantic Jewish Council, among others.

The proclamation, naming the week of Oct. 11 to 18 European Heritage Week, was submitted by Heritage Watch, a Toronto-based white supremacist group, noted the AJC (the Atlantic provinces affiliate of the Canadian Jewish Congress).

Tom Kuttner, chair of community relations for AJC, wrote in a letter to Brown that furtherance of European Heritage Week, "although innocuous on its face, is code for advocating white supremacy in Canada."

Other cities which have come close to sponsoring European Heritage Weeks include Victoria, St. Catherine's, Toronto, Halifax and Charlottetown, said Kuttner.

He congratulated the mayor on taking immediate steps to rescind the proclamation.

Brown was quoted in the Daily Gleaner, a Fredericton newspaper, as saying the city receives several hundred proclamations per year and staff ensures they do not have offensive wording.

City council takes the proclamations at face value unless city hall discovers it is being used for other purposes, he added.

Ross' brother dropped from school committee

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — New Brunswick's anglophone board of education recently voted to replace board member William Ross, the brother of former Moncton school teacher Malcolm Ross, because of the former's belief that the Holocaust is greatly exaggerated.

Shortly after William Ross was appointed to the board's curriculum advisory committee, which deals with the school curriculum for all grades in the province, board chair Larry Batt read a newspaper report detailing Ross' testimony at his brother's defamation trial against cartoonist Josh Beutel last year.

"From what I read, the Jewish people themselves are changing the figures and the numbers and reducing them, and they still say six million," William Ross said at the time.

It was clear to Batt that the credibility of the provincial board and that of the committee were going to be in question unless Ross was not a member, Batt told The CJN in a phone interview from Fredericton.

Ross, a retired school principal, was elected by the parents to represent them locally in a Moncton area district. Although he still represents parents, he lost his board position after a 6-4 vote by 10 of the 12 board members.

Because Ross' quotes originated from court documents, Batt said there "was no real issue about misinterpretation."

Malcolm Ross was awarded $7,500 in the defamation case, following a 1993 incident in which Saint John cartoonist Josh Beutel characterized Ross as a Nazi at a New Brunswick Teachers' Association workshop. Judge Paul Creaghan accepted Beutel's contention that Ross was a racist and held anti-Semitic beliefs, but ruled that Ross' views were not founded on Nazism.

The board's decision, and the fact that it acted of its own accord, is encouraging, said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress.

The notion of presenting the Holocaust as greatly exaggerated is "simply a ruse," Prutschi added. "It really is a cover for denying the Holocaust. Denial of the Holocaust doesn't happen in a vacuum."

UWO students modify sukkah for fire safety

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

LONDON, Ont. — Although Chanukah is the Jewish holiday traditionally associated with a miracle, Arye Berk can't help thinking something miraculous happened at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) this Sukkot.

The Jewish Students' Union (JSU) director began planning for the holiday last winter, when he contacted the university's administrative offices about plans to build what he hoped would be Canada's largest sukkah.

In past years, the JSU has put up a modest 8-foot x 8-foot sukkah in front of the University Community Centre, an area known as Concrete Beach.

This year Berk requested and received permission to build a 48-foot x 43-foot sukkah on a grassy area behind UWO's University College.

The 2,064-square-foot structure, built in partnership with Chabad, was not the largest in Canada (Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue has a 2,280-square-foot sukkah), but it may have been the largest in relation to the JSU's 350 members. Western's total Jewish student population is estimated at 2,500 or more.

The sukkah location, across from the campus police station, offered a measure of security, but on the Friday morning of erev Sukkot, Berk was notified by university officials that the wood-frame sukkah presented a fire hazard.

That night, a sit-down Shabbat dinner for 175 students was to take place in the sukkah.

"We could have been shut down if we did not comply with all the requirements, but [the university] really worked with us. They gave us great suggestions. They were really concerned," said Berk. A city fire marshal was also involved in planning the modifications.

Within a matter of hours – and with the help of student volunteers:

- two new exits were constructed, in addition to the original larger one;
- fire exits were marked with highly visible signs provided by the university;
- electrical lighting was changed;
- tables were arranged a prescribed distance apart, to ensure fire paths were clear;
- slats and schach on the portion of the roof nearest the building were removed;
- an extra partition was created to ensure that all guests were under the schach;
- buffet tables were moved outdoors so that Sterno candles – used to keep the kugel, chicken and tzimmes hot – would not be inside the sukkah;
- three fire extinguishers were provided by the university, "fire pickets" were appointed, armed with extinguishers and trained in case of emergency.

In the end, Berk estimates the sukkah measured approximately 37 feet x 34 feet (1,258 square feet).

"I think it was probably the safest, biggest sukkah you'll ever eat in," said Berk. "We take for granted that we build our sukkahs come fall, but to a fire marshal this is one big deathtrap."

A non-Jewish contractor worked on the sukkah over the first weekend of Sukkot to fine-tune the changes, and the sukkah was open all last week. On Thursday it was the site of a food drive.

The Shabbat dinner went off without incident. One student told Berk the evening left her with a warm feeling.

"If anything, that's what we're trying to do," he told The CJN.

Even the weather co-operated, when early-day rain and clouds vanished. "To be honest," said Berk, "it was a miracle it all worked out."

CLARIFICATION

The subject of the story "Ashkenaz for the whole family" (CJN, Sept. 23), Naomi Kates, said her view on voices for puppets is as follows: "In some puppet shows, particularly recently, we see a freedom that allows the puppeteer to be present on stage with the puppet, both manipulating it and interacting with it."

Clark hopes to build a traditional party

It was a bold gesture, for it would have gone squarely against Canada's policy on Jerusalem, which to this day defines the city as partly occupied. The move would have put Canada in the very rare company of nations which maintain their missions in Jerusalem, thus implying the city is Israel's undisputed capital.

The outcry from Arab states was immediate and loud, so Prime Minister Clark dispatched the former Tory leader, Robert Stanfield, to the Mideast on a fact-finding mission. The verdict: The plan should be scrapped.

And so it was, leaving Clark with egg on his 39-year-old face, and the Jewish community chagrined.

Today, an older and wiser Clark has no trouble conceding that he regrets the episode.

"I think it was a young leader's promise," he told The CJN in a wide-ranging interview just before a three-day party convention kicked off here. "It was something I would not have done with more reflection. I did it at the time because I genuinely thought it would contribute to movements of reconciliation that were already under way. And it became clear that it was unhelpful."

In the end, the pledge "was neither in the better interests of Canada nor [of] the region."

Clark would encounter a fuller complement of Middle East matters later in his political career, namely, as external affairs minister from 1984 to 1991, an interval that included the Palestinian uprising – the intifada – and the start of the Madrid peace process following the Gulf War.

Jewish Canadians may recall the period also saw some of the most contentious and public disagreements between Clark and his boss, Brian Mulroney, when it came to Middle East policy.

Clark lashed out at Israel's handling of the intifada, accusing the Jewish state of "shocking," and "illegal" human rights violations.

But Mulroney said Israel was using "restraint" in handling the uprising.

Later, more mixed signals: It was under Clark's stewardship that Canada upgraded its relations with the PLO, at the same time as Mulroney said the organization was "substantially, if not completely, discredited."

Was the Middle East as sore a point between him and Mulroney as it appeared?

"Yes, I think so," Clark replies. "But I think he and I share a pride in having been able to reach over some of those differences and find common ground. On some, like South Africa, it was simple. On others, like the Middle East, we didn't."

Today, Clark has a larger swath of common ground to explore: The one on the right of Canada's political spectrum. Some Tory insiders say his refusal to unite the right and consider the Reform party's United Alternative practically guarantees that the Liberals will remain in power.

But Clark defends his belief that Tories and Reformers have less in common than many think.

"I'm not arguing a uniting of the right," he says. "That's too narrow. I think we have to unite more than the right. That's part of the reason I have never supported the United Alternative. I think it makes sense to stop splitting votes, but I think that has to be done on the basis of a genuinely national party.

"And frankly, when I look at the Reform clientele who might be ours…" He doesn't complete the thought, but says, "The people we're looking for are interested in fiscal responsibilities, fiscal issues, some law and order issues, certainly institutional issues. But on questions of social policy, of attitudes toward minorities and sexual preference, there is not much common ground between members of Reform and ourselves."

Clark says one reason for his comeback, after a five-year absence from government, was his desire to build what he calls a traditional, national party.

Since the election of Jean Chrétien, "we have, in effect, been a one-party state. Until recently, the four [opposition] parties have not been able to compete effectively with the Liberals. Chrétien has not had to worry for a day in six years that someone could replace him.

"But the other, more serious development is that there are groups that are becoming more and more convinced they are outsiders. I very much classify nationalist Quebecers in that category, putting aside the hard-core indépendantistes who will hold that view forever. Aboriginals are in that group. An increasing number of British Columbians are. The poor are. Part of the deep anger in Atlantic Canada is the sense that policies which struck at the heart of their interests were imposed without much consultation.

"The fact is, we used to have national governments and national parties that were quite successful. And that's broken."

Clark's "major responsibility," as he puts it, is to attract newcomers to Canada and members of minorities to his party to play an active role in policy formation.

He returns to his belief that most francophone Quebecers are not beyond the Conservatives' reach, something he learned as minister responsible for constitutional affairs from 1991 to '93.

"If you put aside hard-core people who vote for the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois, there is a large number of francophone Quebecers who want to be part of Canada," but who have not been made to feel welcome.

Bringing them into the federal fold, Clark acknowledges, "becomes more complicated now because there is no taste for more constitutional change. My own view at some point in time we're going to have a formal recognition [of Quebec] as of a distinct society or unique society, whatever phrase is acceptable. But that won't happen in the short term."

To illustrate, Clark uses his years at External, when he witnessed real ethnic strife around the world. "Having been in communities that are genuinely divided, the reality is that we have no unreconcilable difference. We have fallen into the practice of talking so much about the differences, and emphasizing them, that we have come to believe they are larger than they are."

At 63, Saul Kendal and his grandson, Jason, celebrated their Bar Mitzvahs side-by-side. In September 99, they travelled the streets of Toronto together on Ve'ahavta's Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless.

Status Quo for 13 Iranian Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) remains optimistic there will be a positive resolution to the plight of 13 Iranian Jews being held on charges of spying for Israel.

As far as Congress is concerned, the only resolution to the case is the unconditional release of the 13 suspects, who have been detained in Tehran, without trial since March, charged with espionage for "the Zionist regime."

Despite heated propaganda from Iran threatening more arrests and even executions, the plight of the 13 Jews has actually improved, CJC president Moshe Ronen told The CJN.

The detainees have been allowed family visits and access to lawyers, Ronen said.

And there are "ongoing discussions" between top Iranian leaders and an internationally known retired diplomat who agreed to take on the case at CJC's behest, Ronen said.

The anonymous intermediary "has the respect" of Iran, the United States, the United Nations and Israel, Ronen said, adding that the Iranians "are on track to resolve this matter."

Ronen said "it appears the Iranians are seriously looking to resolve this to our satisfaction," and added that "any resolution short of the [suspects'] release will not be a resolution."

Reports last week said the trial of the 13 is believed to have been postponed indefinitely.

U.S. Jewish leader Malcolm Hoenlein said that according to American Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, Iran is sending out mixed messages, with some parties saying the Jews will not be executed, while others state the death penalty will be carried out.

Ronen says the diplomat is briefing UN Secretary General Koffi Annan on the situation daily. He said he spoke to the man just last week.

The retired envoy is based in North America, but is in contact with top-level Iranian officials personally and by telephone.

At last month's opening session of the UN, Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy briefed Canada's Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy on the situation.

It may take months, but "we are optimistic this is moving in a positive direction," Ronen said.

Israel should not be too trusting of Iran

Initially, the Iranians tried to establish a clear demarcation line between their approach to the United States and their approach to Israel. When that tactic failed, they adopted the notion, which they picked up from a number of Americans, that, unless they reach some sort of dialogue with Israel, they will find it extremely difficult to persuade the U.S. Congress to change its policies vis-a-vis Tehran.

In the eyes of Iranians interested in friendlier ties with America, Israel is the key factor in this warming-up process. Now the Iranians are beginning to abandon their old motto: "The road to Jerusalem goes through southern Lebanon," and to use a new one: "The road to Washington goes through Tel Aviv."

This new approach explains the openness that is beginning to surface in Iran. We should remember that we have here an extremely shrewd rival who wants to use Israel as a tactical springboard but without having to change Iran's basically hostile policy toward Israel.

The Iranians are presently at the stage where they are interested in getting something for nothing. Right now, they do not want to pay anything up front (for example, by freeing the Jews of Shiraz who have been imprisoned on trumped-up charges of espionage on behalf of both Israel and America).

Nonetheless, the Iranians apparently understand that the new breeze blowing from Israel does not represent a substantive change in policy but only a change in style.

Change in style

A similar change in style can be observed in Washington's approach to Iran. Now, when the United States criticizes Iran, it is careful to limit itself to references to a specific act or policy of Tehran and to avoiding blanket criticism of the country, its people and its regime.

Behind the scenes, extensive activity is being conducted, such as low-profile exchange visits. In this area, Washington has taken a dramatic step forward, last year issuing some 20,000 visas to visiting Iranians. For its part, Iran issued only 200 visas to visiting Americans during the same period.

Despite this change in Washington's style, U.S. intelligence experts accept the assessment of their Israeli counterparts concerning Iran's strategic projects and concerning the identity of the country that is helping Tehran in this respect.

For this reason, despite the change in style, Israel must continue to maintain its deterrent policy even if it is given a somewhat lower profile, in the face of a possible Iranian threat. Deterrence is not some abstract concept but must be based on a solid defence system and on various options for massive retaliation.

Moreover, if Israeli military intelligence is correct in its evaluation that Iran is trying to develop nuclear capability and is doing everything possible to achieve that goal (manufacture of plutonium and enriched uranium, attempts to obtain fissionable nuclear materials), Israel should not be the only nation interested in a deterrent policy for Iran. The deterrent network should also include the United States.

Syrians seen jacking up terms for peace

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Syrians are not content with their demand that Israel withdraw from the Golan Heights and from the areas west of the international boundary that they seized and held until June 4, 1967, the eve of the Six Day War.

They are insisting that the question of the "demilitarized zones" – some parts of which lie to the west of the June 4, 1967 lines – be reopened as well.

This is, patently, an opening position in the negotiations. It has no chance of getting further than that, but Damascus apparently believes that this will ultimately make it easier to bring about an Israeli pullback to the lines that existed until the Six Day War.

The ploy is that the Syrians will give the impression that they have backtracked on their broader demand in connection with the demilitarized zones.

The Syrian position should not be construed as an attempt to gain control of kibbutzim such as Ein Gev, Tel Katzir and Haon, which are located in the southern part of the former demilitarized zones. It is, rather, an effort to challenge Israel's sovereignty over the entire eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee.

During Israel's 1948 War of Independence, the Syrians seized a number of areas west of the international boundary line, including the settlements of Mishmar Hayarden, Sha'ar Hagolan and Massada.

Under the terms of the Israeli-Syrian armistice agreement, which was signed on July 20, 1949, the Syrians pulled back from these locales to the border, and part of the areas they had held were declared demilitarized zones.

All told, the area of these zones totaled 66.5 square kilometres. The southern zone was the largest, extending from the Al Hama enclave near the Yarmuk River and continuing along the southeastern shore of the Sea of Galilee until a point north of Kibbutz Ein Gev.

It is important to point out that farther to the north, along the northeastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, there was no demilitarized zone. The international boundary line extended until 10 metres from the lake, but the Syrians seized the 10-metre strip, which they now are demanding within the framework of an Israeli withdrawal to the June 4, 1967 lines.

The demilitarized zones immediately became the subject of a dispute between the sides, which Syria is now apparently trying to place on the negotiating agenda. Damascus claims that its withdrawal from the zones did not make them sovereign Israeli territory; their political status remained open until a diplomatic agreement could be reached.

From the Syrians' point of view, not only is Israel barred from stationing troops in those zones, it is also prohibited from carrying out development work in them.

Syria claims to represent the Arabs who owned the land and fled into Syrian territory.

The Americans know the truth

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The Americans know whether Israel did, in fact, promise, as Assad claims, that in the context of a peace agreement, it would withdraw from all of the Golan Heights, including those territories captured by the Syrians, and which they held until June 4, 1967, the eve of the Six Day War.

Commentary

Furthermore, the Americans are, to a large extent, responsible for the confusion that has been created over this issue. The Syrians are basing themselves on what they claim to have heard from American Secretary of State Warren Christopher, speaking on behalf of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. The negotiations were subsequently continued by Shimon Peres.

Even during Rabin's lifetime, there was a feeling among Israeli leaders that Washington had allowed itself to be overly generous in its presentation of "Israel's position" to the Syrians without bothering to receive prior authorization from Jerusalem.

It is true that Rabin said to Christopher that he would be ready to negotiate the possibility of an Israeli pullback to the June 4, 1967 lines if Israel's conditions concerning peace and security arrangements were met.

Christopher was explicitly told that he was to keep Rabin's position "in the safe" and that he was not authorized to present it as an Israeli proposal. He promised Rabin that he would place the proposal in his pocket, and thus the proposal was referred in some circles as the "pocket file." However, like any mediator trying to make headway, the Americans apparently went one step further, adopting in this respect Henry Kissinger's mediation strategy.

It appears that they informed Assad that if he carried out certain measures, Israel would not oppose negotiations over the possibility of a pullback to the June 4 lines. In fact, the Americans might even have added a few details that we know nothing about.

Here is the origin of this confusing situation that has enabled Assad to argue that Israel promised to withdraw to the June 4 lines and that, unless Israel reiterates this promise, the peace talks cannot be resumed. In other words, Assad, unlike other Arab leaders with whom Israel has negotiated, is saying to Israel essentially: "First give in, then we'll talk about the rest."

This kind of approach can obviously not be defined under the category of "negotiations." Instead, it is a demand for an unconditional surrender. In principle, and even from a moral standpoint, such a condition cannot be accepted. Even if we were to arrive at a peace agreement on the basis of this condition, the danger is that it would be a bad agreement to begin with.

Some Syrians claim that they have never recognized their country's international border with Israel, a border that was agreed upon in 1916 under the terms of the Sykes-Picot accord between France and Britain. But there are other Syrians, such as UN ambassador Zeyan A-Din, who in his response on November 18, 1953 to Abba Eban's speech, said that the Sykes-Picot agreement of 1916 must serve as the basis for any future agreement.

In contrast, Eban stated that Israel recognized the international border but that the accompanying agreement between the British and French governments was not binding on Israel.

Since that "dialogue," the Syrians have modified their position in accordance with what has been convenient for them at any given moment. At times, they have recognized the international border, and at times, they have refused to recognize it. In the 1950s and 1960s, they even removed the stones marking that border.

If this is the Syrians' approach, as expressed in an interview granted by their ambassador in Washington, and if there is actually no recognized international border between the two countries, Israel has the right to demand that the border run along the cliffs of the Golan Heights, far from the Sea of Galilee.

If, however, the Syrians claim ownership to the land they occupied until June 4, 1967, because it was in their possession for 18 years (incidentally, no one has seen any authentic Syrian map of this territory dating back to the pre-1967 era), they must be reminded that Israel has held the present border for 32 years (that is, from June 1967).

If territory that the Syrians seized by force of arms in 1949 – and which they held for 18 years – grants them ownership, possession by Israel of territory for 32 years is an even stronger claim for ownership.

The key is now in the hands of the Americans. Christopher has already indirectly expressed his view on the issue when he stated that the agreement on the principles of the security arrangements between Syria and Israel – principles worked out in a document labeled a "non-letter" – are not binding if one of the parties withdraws its consent to them.

The rationale he gave for this position was the fact that the document was not a signed memorandum but was, rather, a semi-official document that the Americans obtained in the talks between the two sides. All the more reason, therefore, for the position that Israel's verbal promise – if it was ever made – is not binding.

The rest of the American responses to Syrian demands have been weak-kneed, apparently in an attempt not to offend either side.

We have now reached a crossroads: The Americans must be more explicit on this sensitive issue or must suggest some creative way out that will enable the talks to be resumed. Otherwise, we will have to wait until Assad's heir comes to power.

The Week in Israel

Sept 27

• Israeli media reported that Syria refused to let Hamas set up its political headquarters in Damascus. The decision came after Jordanian officials closed the Hamas office in Amman.

Sept. 28

• The media reported that the new Barak government had requested tenders to build 2,600 housing units in the territories during the first three months of the year. By comparison, the former government of Benjamin Netanyahu had sought 3,000 such bids for the entire previous year.

Sept. 29

• Oman's foreign minister, Youssef bin Alawi bin Abdullah, told Israeli foreign minister, David Levy, at the UN that Oman would host regional discussions on water problems when multilateral Middle East talks resumed.

• According to Ha'aretz, the change of government in Israel halted efforts by Russian organized crime to get close to Israeli officials. The paper cited senior Israeli police as saying that since the arrest and conviction in Israel of Gregory Lerner, considered a senior figure in Russian organized crime, Russian "mob" activities in Israel have dropped sharply.

Sept. 30

• A senior member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine arrived in Jericho. Abu Ali Mustafa, the deputy leader of the Damascus-based group that opposes the Oslo peace process, was given an entry permit by Israel.

Oct. 1

• The head of IDF personnel announced that Israelis who left Israel prior to the age of 16 and wished to return after age 30 would no longer be obligated to serve in the IDF. Similarly, Israelis who left the country after age 16 without serving in the IDF would be permitted to visit Israel up to 120 days per year without special authorization from Israeli missions abroad. The new regulations are scheduled to take effect as of January 2000.

Treaty with Jordan holds

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Five years ago, in the face of bitter opposition from Syria, Jordan defied conventional wisdom and became the second Arab country after Egypt to sign a peace treaty with Israel. It had always been assumed that Lebanon would follow in Egypt's footsteps. But this theory was invalidated by Lebanon's alliance with Syria.

Israel's historic agreement with Jordan has endured despite Jordanian domestic opposition, Jordan's sharp criticism of the previous Israeli government's peace policies, the 1997 Khaled Meshal affair, and the death of its chief advocate, King Hussein.

His successor, Abdullah II, who ascended to the throne last winter, has made it abundantly clear that Jordan's relationship with Israel is a strategic imperative. Recently declaring that he would pursue his late father's legacy, Abdullah said that he was committed to a "warm peace" with Israel. Driving home the point, he asserted that Jordan's relations with Israel would not suffer as a result of its efforts to improve relations with such neighboring Arab countries as Syria, Iraq and Saudi Arabia.

Although he has not visited Israel since his coronation, Abdullah has conferred with Prime Minister Ehud Barak and his predecessor, Benjamin Netanyahu, as well as Gen. Shaul Mofaz, the Israeli chief of staff.

The brainchild of Yitzhak Rabin and his foreign minister, Shimon Peres, the treaty came into being on Oct. 26, 1994, three months after Israel and Jordan reached a framework for peace known as the Washington Declaration. Full diplomatic ties were established on Dec. 10 with the opening of embassies in Tel Aviv and Amman. Ambassadors were exchanged in March 1995. Israel and Jordan then signed a series of political, economic and cultural agreements. Military and intelligence cooperation was formalized.

King Hussein's decision to make peace with Israel was hardly astonishing, notwithstanding his oft-repeated assertion that he would not do so until Israel withdrew to the pre-1967 ceasefire lines. Israel has a clear interest in Jordan's stability. It saved his throne in 1970 by massing troops on the Syrian border. King Hussein, since 1963, regularly held clandestine meetings with Israeli prime ministers.

By 1994, he was ready for a peace treaty. The PLO had come to terms with Israel in 1993. Jordan, having severed its administrative ties with the West Bank in 1988, was no longer encumbered by a special obligation to the Palestinians to shun Israel.

Secondly, King Hussein correctly calculated that a rapprochement with Israel would ease his isolation and render Jordan eligible for foreign aid. He had damaged Jordan's relations with the West, particularly the United States, by his lukewarm support of Iraq during the 1991 Gulf War.

Thirdly, Jordan asked for, and received, tangible concessions from Israel, both of which have an interest in containing the forces of radical Arab nationalism and Islamic fundamentalism. Under the provisions of the treaty, Jordan regained 350 square kilometres of territory in the Negev desert Israel had encroached upon for security reasons. Jordan also wrung a guaranteed supply of water from Israel. In addition, Israel recognized Jordan's "historic role" as protector of Muslim holy places in eastern Jerusalem.

Israel, for its part, made peace with a country with which it shares its longest border, and was given assurances that no hostile foreign armies would be stationed in Jordan.

The treaty has been fiercely castigated in Arab nationalist, Palestinian and Islamist circles as "the king's peace." Professional associations, largely controlled by these groups, have threatened members with expulsion if they do business with Israelis. Less ideological Jordanians have complained that the fruits of peace have not filtered down to the masses. Indeed, the treaty has not brought Jordan prosperity.

Be that as it may, the Jordanian government is sticking to it. Abdullah's recent crack down on Hamas, which his father tolerated, is clearly indicative of Jordan's desire to maintain the status quo.

LEVY AND AXWORTHY MEET

Canadian Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy (right) recently met with his Israeli counterpart, David Levy, at the annual reconvening of the United Nations in New York, where they reviewed the peace process and bilateral relations. David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, also participated in the meeting. Levy briefed Axworthy on recent advancements in the peace process, on the Palestinian track, as well as on the Syrian and Lebanese tracks. Levy stressed the need to move ahead with the multi-lateral track, the essence of which is to promote co-operation between Israel and its neighbors as a means to facilitate the peace process. On bilateral relations, Axworthy and Levy spoke about the up-coming visit by Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to Israel, and discussed ways to further develop the good relations between the two countries.

Simchat Torah in Riga

By BLAKE LAMBERT
Special to The CJN

RIGA, Latvia — It's a Saturday night in Riga and activity in its Old Town is thrumming.

Yet on this night that comes but once a year, the biggest event is contained beneath the stained-glass windows of Riga's only synagogue.

As this night is none other than Simchat Torah, if you haven't come to dance, sing, or imbibe a lot of vodka, you might as well stay home.

It is a night where Jews embrace, dance and sing. Once in a while, the North Americans try to come up for a breath of air, to catch a moment of respite from the frenzied singing and dancing, only to be tossed back by two joyful Lubavitch rabbis.

For the Jews of Riga, anywhere from 6,000 to 12,000 depending on who you ask, this is the holiday that towers over all the others.

They come by the hundreds on this night. Some wearing hats: baseball, berets, or hats with single cowboy brims.They come toting cellular phones, babies, vodka and food as they plan to picnic on the synagogue's yellow-painted benches.

They come even if they don't come on any other holiday. Several hundred Jews come to synagogue on this night because the Soviets said they could. And the Soviet empire, for those who forget, liked religion about as much as they enjoyed the free market theories of Adam Smith.

It even outlawed the celebration of Christmas, permitting New Year's celebrations instead.

Before the Soviets and their nearly 50 years of religious suppression, came the Nazis, who occupied Latvia for three years and killed off 90 percent of the country's Jews.

They started in 1941, an elderly man says in Hebrew as he points to a couple of memorials with burning lights at the back of the synagogue.

They killed Jews in every city across Latvia, he says in a matter of fact manner.

In a pre-party address, Rabbi Barkan, the chief rabbi of Riga and Latvia, wishes everyone a good year. As he proceeds with his speech, he delivers the evening's main message: It should be this crowded on every holiday, and not just this night.

The gathered throng murmurs in the background, as they feel the excitement starting to build. Some men have already brought out their bottles of vodka and are handing out shots.

Eventually, the vodka flows freer than at a fraternity party. The singing and dancing is out of tune and raucous and wonderful.

Soon, the religious, spiritual or cultural revelry kicks into gear and the appropriate brand of ecstasy begins. And for one night, for a few hours and with a few songs, it felt like the last 50 years of history was forgotten.

Brunner hiding in Damascus

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BERLIN — A French investigation has determined that despite repeated denials by the Syrian government, one of the world's most-wanted Nazi war criminals is hiding out in Damascus, a German magazine reported yesterday.

Former Nazi SS officer Alois Brunner, who is facing a war crimes trial in France, is living under the name Georg Fischer in a suite in the hotel Meridien, Der Spiegel said, citing the results of a lengthy probe by a French investigating judge.

The Austrian-born Brunner, now 87, has long been believed to be living in Syria. France and Germany have both asked for his extradition, but Syrian officials have consistently denied any knowledge of Brunner.

Serving as a top aide to Adolf Eichmann, the overseer of the Nazi death machine, Brunner allegedly helped organize the deportation and murder of at least 130,000 Jews from Germany, Austria, France and Greece.

A French judge recommended on Sept. 1 that Brunner be tried in absentia for allegedly deporting 250 Jewish children to Auschwitz, where they died. The trial is expected to begin next year.

Der Spiegel said Austrian police placed Brunner's daughter, who lives in Austria, under surveillance for several weeks early this year at the request of German authorities to see if she had any contact with her father, but none was observed.

U.S. Jews attack Bush over Buchanan stance

By NITZAN HOROWITZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Jewish newspapers, columnists, religious and lay leaders bitterly attacked Texas governor George W. Bush last week for trying to persuade rival presidential candidate Pat Buchanan not to leave the Republican party.

Buchanan, who is on the verge of leaving the Republican party to seek the presidential nomination of the Reform party, recently argued in a book that Britain and France should not have gone to war with Nazi Germany after its invasion of Poland in 1939. He even suggested that their declaration of war made them partially responsible for the subsequent destruction of European Jewry. Buchanan also contended that the United States had no interest in fighting Germany even after Hitler conquered France.

American Jews, many of whom have long regarded Buchanan as an anti-Semite because of his many past statements attacking Israel and Jewish causes, were outraged. Now they are furious that Bush is urging Buchanan to remain a Republican and has failed to vigorously denounce the governor's views.

"The Jewish community has been struck by Bush's reaction, by his desire to see Buchanan remain within the party and his failure to address the concerns and objections Jews have to Buchanan," said Mark Pelavin, director of the Religious Action Centre of Reform Judaism.

"We have also noted with extreme displeasure and concern the way Republican chairman Jim Nicholson has been virtually begging Buchanan not to leave the party," he said.

Bush, who is leading the Republican presidential field by a wide margin, has repeatedly said he did not want Buchanan to leave the party because he needed the votes of his supporters.

Campaigning in California last Wednesday, however, Bush said: "Obviously, his [Buchanan's] revisionist history about World War II is wrong."

The Bush campaign said Friday that it would have nothing to add to Bush's words. A third-party candidacy by Buchanan is likely to attract some right-wing voters who would otherwise support the Republican candidate.

Rabbi Stuart Weinblatt of Congregation B'nai Tzedek, a conservative Jewish synagogue in Maryland, said his congregants were paying close attention to how Bush had handled the Buchanan issue.

"This is a test of Bush's moral character and it looks as if Bush is failing the test. He's more concerned with not losing the right wing than with doing the right thing," he said.

Rabbi Ken Cohen, executive director of the United Synagogues of Conservative Judaism's Seaboard region, said Bush had made a grave error.

"He wants to be inclusive, but this makes him look exclusive. This will alienate Jewish Republican voters," he said.

Several Jewish weekly newspapers weighed in on the issue Friday. The New York Jewish News said, "The misguided pleas to Buchanan send a terrible message that intolerance and bigotry will be tolerated in the party if they produce enough votes on election day."

For Heaven's Sake

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

People are always saying, "For heaven's sake," or "Good heavens!"

But does anyone really know what heaven is? Or where it is?

Isaiah, the hero of For Heaven's Sake, by Sandy Eisenberg Sasso, with pictures by Kathryn Kunz Finney, (Jewish Lights, 1999), spends a lot of time thinking about that.

When he eats a whole bunch of blueberries, which he loves to do, people are always saying "For heaven's sake, Isaiah!"

When he asks people about heaven, he isn't very satisfied with what they tell him.

He especially doesn't like the mailperson's answer. Isaiah thinks that a heaven where "you don't have to carry anything, where you can sit around all day and rest," sounds terribly boring.

He is even more eager to know where heaven is when he learns that his grandfather went there to be with God.

His grandmother finally takes him to some of the places his grandfather used to go, places that were special to both of them.

Can you guess where Isaiah finds that heaven is?

The story is based on a very old legend of a rabbi who wanted to know where heaven is. What he discovered surprised him just as much as Isaiah's discovery surprised him.

Sandy Eisenberg Sasso has written many wonderful books for children, such as God in Between, a story of a town that tries to find where God is; God's Paintbrush, which shows children exploring issues of religious faith; and A Prayer for the Earth, the story of Naamah, the wife of Noah.

All of this author's books have beautiful, bright pictures in them, and tell a wonderful story that you will enjoy reading again and again.

You will also find yourself talking to people about what they think about heaven.

Zoladex approved in fight against prostate cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Harry Weinstein is very glad that he listens to his wife Molly.

Ten years ago, concerned about his frequent urination, Molly persuaded him to have his prostate gland tested. An ultrasound at Mount Sinai Hospital showed that he had prostate cancer.

He was referred to Dr. Padraig Warde, head of the genitourinary site group at Princess Margaret Hospital, and an associate professor at the University of Toronto in the department of radiation oncology.

Weinstein joined a trial, led in Canada by Warde, of a new drug zoladex (goserelin acetate). Along with radiation therapy five days a week for six weeks, he was given an injection of zoladex before the radiation therapy, and once a month after that for three years.

That was seven years ago. Since then, Weinstein told The CJN, "I have led a normal life. I am cancer-free."

Weinstein is not unique, Warde told a recent press conference at Princess Margaret Hospital. With zoladex, he said, "there has been a major increase in the survival rate – from 62 to 78 percent. The disease-free survival rate after five years has jumped from 40 to 78 percent."

While the study, which was conducted by the European Organization for Research and Treatment of Cancer, ended in 1995, patients have been followed since then. "The results have held rock steady for over five years," Warde said.

The walnut-sized prostate, a male sex gland, lies below the bladder in front of the rectum, and surrounds the urethra. It produces a thick fluid that forms part of the semen.

Zoladex is not for all men with prostate cancer. It is only for those whose cancer has spread just outside the prostate gland, but is still confined to the pelvic area.

Canada was the second largest trial site, Warde said, explaining that trials were also held in Belgium, France, Germany and Switzerland. Because the results were so successful, said Warde, zoladex plus radiation therapy is now the treatment of choice for locally advanced prostate cancer.

Apart from side effects from the radiation, there are very few from zoladex. Because it lowers the amount of the male hormone testosterone in the body, there may be lowered sexual libido and performance, or some fluid retention, Warde said.

The Weinsteins have just celebrated their 51st wedding anniversary.

New medical database developed

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A new technique for gathering and analyzing medical data on heart patients has been developed by a team that includes representatives from government, the health care profession and a pharmaceutical company.

Dr. Richard Davies, a cardiologist and director of clinical research at the Ottawa Heart Institute, is part of the team that developed and is implementing the ACES system (Acute Coronary Extended Surveillance).

ACES is a computerized "notepad" that will be used by doctors and nurses to gather and record medical data in an accurate and efficient manner.

What began as a research initiative evolved into a tool that will help doctors and nurses provide better bedside care in a less hurried manner.

"While everyone accepts that research is valuable, done the traditional way, it is very expensive [to get data] and it is not possible to sustain because of the number of patients," says Davies.

"So we took advantage of an initiative by the federal government and proposed that we would try to get the data by giving computer tools to the doctors and nurses. We developed software applications that would...help them collect the data."

The notepads contain questions that would normally be asked about a patient's health.

Computerized notepad

Using a special pen on the screen, the nurse or doctor records the answers and then, by simply touching the "send" button, is able to transmit the information to a computer at the nurses' station.

The information is filed and printed instantly, eliminating the need to transcribe notes later, and providing uniform, clear, concise data.

By using this system, medical practitioners will be able to spend more time with patients. Researchers will have access to Canada's first comprehensive clinical database on heart patients.

"This is a win-win situation," says Davies. "The better it works for health care, the better it works for research. It is a positive thing that feeds on itself."

The partners, who spent more than three years developing the system, included Health Canada's Centre for Disease Control, Statistics Canada, the Heart and Stroke Foundation and Bristol-Myers Squibb pharmaceutical company. Manta Corp. of Ottawa developed the software.

Nurses at Ottawa's Heart Institute have already begun to use the system and Davies has been travelling to coronary centres across Canada to introduce it. Reaction has been positive, he says, and he predicts that its use will expand quickly.

Seinfeld's Uncle Leo star of comedy in Mississauga

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

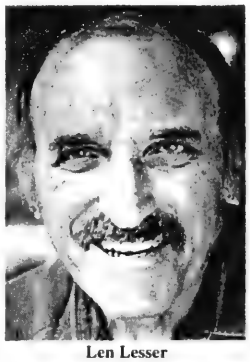
TORONTO— The real name of actor Len Lesser (Uncle Leo, a recurring character in TV's Seinfeld) is Letofsky, (his father was born in Poland) but at Ellis Island many years ago an immigration officer couldn't spell it, so it was Lesser from then on.

"People are constantly asking me about Uncle Leo and how he did things in the Seinfeld show," said Lesser.

He is appearing in the lead role of the father in the comedy Is That You Norman? at Stage West, Mississsauga, until Nov. 21.

Lesser,who is on stage the whole play, gets splendid support from a quartet of Canadian actors, Jonathan Purdon, Wade Lynch, Pat Dawson and Janet Zenik.

A New Yorker by birth and education,(he got a degree in economics from City College of New York), he remembers the days in the late '40s and early '50s when he lived in cold water garrets and worked at part-time jobs while he followed his dream of being an actor.



Len Lesser

His role in Is That You Norman? is a demanding one, made more difficult by the fact he has to wear a hearing aid to overcome a disability.

"On opening night, I had new hearing aids and as soon as I stepped on stage they began to whistle in my ears. I wanted to shout 'pull down the curtain' but I held back and we got through it all right. I'll have new moulds made to fix it."

In Is That You Norman?, Lesser plays a husband abandoned by his wife who has run off with his brother. Lesser arrives in New York from Dayton, Ohio, only to find that his son is gay. But his wife comes back to the roost, his son joins the U.S. Navy, and the son's friend is adopted by the reunited couple. Plot is not the strong point of Is That You Norman?

But the weird shenanigans, underscored by a gentle ribbing of gay people, provide lots of laughs.

In the role of Garson, the son's man friend, who wears velvet pants and loves his pussy cat, Lynch is outstanding without going over the top.

Is That You Norman? is strictly entertainment and should not be taken too seriously, he said. "I hope the audience doesn't identify me with the very negative views about homosexuality that my character in the play has. My feelings are not like that at all."

Lesser considers his role as the most challenging in a long list of movies, TV and stage roles.

His only other visit to Canada was in 1980 when he filmed Death Hunt with Charles Bronson at Banff.

So far, Lesser hasn't been outside his hotel at Stage West, but in the weeks ahead hopes to become acquainted with Toronto's attractions.

Jew's lynching in the United States examined in Scandal TV series

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leo Frank has the dubious distinction of being the first and only Jew to have been lynched in the United States.

The manager of a pencil factory in Atlanta, Georgia, he was found guilty of murdering 13-year-old Mary Phagan, an employee, and was sentenced to be executed.

The year was 1913.

In 1915, when his sentence was commuted, an anti-Semitic mob of rednecks grabbed Frank from his cell and drove him to Phagan's former hometown.

The ring leaders demanded a confession of guilt from him, but he refused. They mutilated his genitals and strung him up on a tree.

On Oct. 8 at 10 p.m., History Television tells his story in a fascinating documentary entitled Southern Nights. Part of the new Scandal! Now and Then series, it is brought to the small screen by Associated Producers of Toronto.

As Southern Nights suggests, the Frank case was a national cause celebre with all the ingredients of classic crime: blood, gore, sex, duplicity, sensational newspaper headlines and racism.

Frank, the hapless defendant, was widely viewed as an outsider, a Northerner and a Jew. Phagan, emblematic of besmirched Southern womanhood, was elevated into a dime-store heroine.

A dour mechanical engineer born in Texas and raised in New York City, Frank was less than charismatic in his defence. To add to his troubles, Frank's lawyers believed, incorrectly, that they could wear down one of the prosecutor's chief witnesses, a black janitor in the factory named Jim Conley.

Leo Frank

Hugh Dorsey, Georgia's attorney-general, shamelessly used the case to advance his political career. Tom Watson, an ambitious publisher and aspiring politician, whipped the white population into an anti-Jewish frenzy.

The person whose integrity remained more or less intact during this dark period was John Slaton, the governor of the state. Much against the public will, he commuted Frank's sentence from hanging to life imprisonment.

Nearly 70 years after Frank's demise, Alonzo Mann, an office boy in the factory, signed an affidavit attesting to his innocence. In 1986, the Georgia Board of Pardons and Parole issued a posthumous pardon. Yet, to this day, it remains unclear who actually murdered Phagan.

Southern Nights, bolstered by dramatic file footage, achieves a measure of perspective by on-camera interviews with a number of individuals.

They are: a historian of anti-Semitism in the United States (Leonard Dinnerstein); a celebrity lawyer (Alan Dershowitz, who claims that "this case was fixed"); a Southern Jewish playwright (Alfred Uhry, author of Driving Miss Daisy and Show Parade, a play about the Frank affair); and the descendants of Tom Watson and Mary Phagan, both of whom contend that Frank was guilty as charged.

In short, Southern Nights takes us back to a time and a place which lives in infamy in the annals of American Jewish history.

Local lyricist pens the words to Swingstep musical

BY KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The poetic words of lyricist Steven Mayoff will be wafting through the air at Toronto's Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, in Silver Fox Productions' new musical Swingstep, running Oct. 12 until Nov. 28.

"Swingstep takes place in Cape Breton and is about love loss and regrets of an older man, who doesn't want to see his granddaughter, a dancer, make the same mistakes he did, and not follow her heart," Mayoff says.

"When a swing band comes to town, she falls for the leader, Sonny, the grandson of a woman who left Cape Breton and happened to be the love of the older man. It is very exciting to watch the choreography. The show has created a hybrid of something new, combining swing music and step dancing."

Mayoff wrote the lyrics based on a script by his longtime partner Ted Dykstra.

Originally from Montreal, Mayoff's career in theatre began when he met actor, writer, composer and director Dykstra, while Dykstra was attending the National Theatre School in Montreal.

Steven Mayoff follows the pack

"I met Ted in 1981, through a mutual friend. He asked me to write him some lyrics. I did, and we've been writing together for 17 years.

"I wrote lyrics for musician friends in high school. When I started writing with Ted, that's when I started thinking about writing more seriously."

In 1984, the Dykstra/Mayoff team moved to Toronto. "The way it works at The National Theatre School," Mayoff says "is once you've graduated, if you want to work in theatre, you have to move to Toronto because there was no English theatre in Montreal. All my friends were moving; I followed the pack."

Once in Toronto, Mayoff and Dykstra began writing tunes that were leading nowhere fast. Their love of the theatre made writing for the stage the perfect showcase for their music. Although Mayoff does not sing or play an instrument, he has an affinity for music that is demonstrated in his lyrics.

Inspired by the success of The Phantom Of The Opera, Mayoff was looking for a good book to make into a musical. "I went to visit a friend in Ottawa and was looking at his library, when I saw a copy of Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Grey. I showed it to Ted, he updated it." Their collaboration culminated in 1989 with a performance at the Cameron House in Toronto. We packed the place with friends, directors and producers."

The two let the project sleep for awhile, until Dykstra, who co-wrote the successful Two Pianos, Four Hands with Richard Greenblatt, showed the Dorian Grey project to producers in New York who were vying for the rights of Two Pianos...

New York producer Roger Hess put up money for a two week workshop and two performances at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre Extra Space. Hess, with director Lonny Price, plans to work with Mayoff and Dykstra on a New York workshop leading to the Broadway stage by late fall 2000.

Mayoff's other credits include writing lyrics for recording artist Melanie Doane, who happens to be married to Dykstra. He is currently working on two projects with classical composer Pierre Gallant, a libretto based on the novel The Spy In The House Of Love, by Anais Nin and a song cycle called Youkali inspired by the music of Kurt Weill.

In addition, Mayoff and Dykstra have teamed up with playwright Paula Wing on a show called Club Lafayette loosely based on Shakespeare's Measure for Measure, to be showcased next summer by the Soulpepper Company.

Actor Stephen Guy-McGrath has called upon Mayoff to help him expand his show, Bully. Through this association with Guy-McGrath, Mayoff was invited to work on Swingstep.

"The producers of Swingstep were looking for a new creative team from Canada, and Stephen, who plays Bri in the show, suggested me," Mayoff says. "Ironically, another cast member recommended Ted, so we decided we would do the show together.

Swingstep originally played in Hamilton, Ontario and Myrtle Beach, S.C., but it needed work. So, Ted is rewriting the story and I am rewriting the lyrics with the original composer Charles Cozens."

Tickets for Swingstep are available at the Ford Centre Box Office, 5040 Yonge Street; Ticketmaster; or by calling 870-8000.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

SALE FOCUSES ON EARLY DAYS OF TEL AVIV

Two paintings depicting scenes of Tel Aviv in its early years are among the international and Israeli art works being offered for sale by Sotheby's Auction House in Tel Aviv in celebration of Tel Aviv's 90th anniversary.

The two paintings are Rothschild Boulevard, which Ziona Tajar painted in the early 1920s, and The Old Sycamores, painted by Reuven Rubin in 1929.

Regarded as the first woman artist born in the modern land of Israel, Tajar's painting represents the tree-lined avenue on which she was raised, and shows numerous early city landmarks. It is expected to fetch between $30,000 and $40,000 (US).

Rubin's painting, valued at $180,000 to $250,000 (US), features camels passing a stand of sycamore trees on a dirt path which was then the road that connected Jaffa with the north. Today those trees form an oasis on busy King George Street in central Tel Aviv.

Other artists represented include Yohanan Simon, Marcel Janco, Moshe Castel, Mordechai Ardon, Israel Paldi and Avigdor Stematsky.

Several paintings by Marc Chagall are also included in the sale, as are various 19th-century, Holy-Land scenes by John Rogers Herbert and Thomas Ralph Spence.

The auction at Sotheby's, located at 46 Rothschild Blvd. in Tel Aviv, takes place 8 p.m Oct. 18. Viewing begins Oct. 14.

Hospital Benefit: The Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital in Israel is sponsoring its annual gala concert on Oct. 13, 8 p.m., at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts in North York. Featured performers include internationally renowned harpist Erica Goodman, flautist Susan Hoeppner and pianist Halida Dinova. 256-4222.

Literary Notes

• Writer-director Al Waxman has produced a biography, That's What I Am, for which publisher Malcolm Lester has arranged a launch party, Oct. 7, 6 to 7 p.m. at Indigo Books Music & Cafe, 55 Bloor St. W.

• The current (Oct.) issue of Toronto Life offers For Doris, a relaxed, informative piece by veteran journalist Jack Batten about the literary Giller Prize. A former Montrealer, Toronto developer Jack Rabinovitch instituted the $25,000 annual Giller Prize in memory of his wife, Doris Giller, who died in 1993.

With the blessings and support of Mordecai Richler, Alice Munro, Alberto Manguel and other literary heavyweights, the prize has become "the richest and most prestigious English-language fiction award in Canada."

Also in the current Toronto Life, Leanne Delap and Jacob Richler offer a list of where ex-Montrealers can find their habitual favorites in Toronto: the cover shows a smoked meat sandwich. Alas, the magazine devotes nearly a full page to Moishe's, the famed Montreal steak-house that expanded into downtown Toronto a few years ago – but which closed up shop here a couple of weeks ago, evidently as the magazine was going to press.

Music & Drama

• An orchestra led by Robert Raines performs Turanian Fantasia (The Hungarians) and other works by Miklos Emhecht, as well as pieces by Debussy, Johann Strauss, Haydn and others at an Oct. 9 concert at Church of the Redeemer, 162 Bloor St. W.

Emhecht, a Torontonian, is a member of the Technion Society and Habonim Hall. Sponsored by the Republic of Hungary's embassy in Canada. $20.

• Jacob Two-Two Meets the Klezmer All-Stars is the opening concert in Harbourfront's Cushion Concerts Series, featuring the Toronto-based group The Klezmer All-Stars.

Bring your children to hear CBC radio host Barbara Budd tell Mordecai Richler's classic tale, Jacob Two-Two. Oct. 10. 1 p.m., Du Maurier Theatre Centre, Harbourfront. $8. 973-4000.

• The 115-voice Amadeus Choir opens its 25th anniversary season with Songs of an Ancient Heritage, a concert by esteemed Jewish composers. George Weston Recital Hall, Ford Centre, Oct. 13, 3 p.m. Pre-concert talk by composer Srul Irving Glick $28 and $32. 872-8000.

• Bob Schneider and the Rainbow Kids continues its run at Solar Stage Children's Theatre, 4950 Yonge. Str. Oct. 10, 11a.m. and 2p.m.

The children's performer has been writing, recording and performing with and for children for the past decade and he's won a Juno for best Children's Recording. $8.50. Call 368-8031.

• Originally scheduled to air last February but cancelled due to the CBC strike, The Nature of Things features Torontonian Minn Sandler, who at 102, reveals the secrets to a long and healthy life.

How to Live to 100, Oct. 11 at 9 p.m. on CBC TV.

At the Galleries

• Traceless, an exhibition of paintings of Gideon Tomaschoff, is on view at the Edward Day Gallery, 33 Hazelton Ave., until Oct. 24.

The Israeli-born Tomaschoff, a Toronto resident, paints large canvases, in oil and mixed media, of various aspects and impressions of old walls, beaten and stained by time and the elements. 921-6540.

• Now & Then, featuring sculpture and paintings by Karen Reiss, opens Oct. 7 at the Nathan Shiff Gallery, 1252 Danforth Ave. Meet the artist at a reception Oct. 7, 7 to 9 p.m. and hear poetry read by Murray Reiss. Show runs through Nov. 4. 463-8957.

Yohann Simon's The Bus Queue is on sale at Sotheby's Auction House in Tel-Aviv to celebrate the city's 90th anniversary.

A new voice for everyone to hear

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

It appears that the crowded pantheon of formidable Israeli female singer/songwriters may soon be joined by a young 26-year-old from Beersheva, known simply as Nourith.

Combining the lyric sensitivity of Naomi Shemer with the dazzling musical range of Ophra Haza and the crystal clear sound of Noa, Nourith's entry into the recording world is stylish and enjoyable.

The album is called Kol Yishama, and is produced by Polydor.

For those who understand Hebrew, the title holds a double meaning. At the most obviously literal level it means "a voice will be heard." At the next level, with but the most minor adjustment in the verb, yishama, the title can also mean "everyone will hear."

Indeed, for anyone with an interest in strong female voices in the tradition of the balladeer or chanteuse, Nourith's voice should be heard.

Kol Yishama has 13 songs. It is rich in orchestration and harmonies that accompany but do not overwhelm the showcasing of Nourith's voice.

It opens with the title song, Kol Yishama, an understated, softly-sung declaration of maturing love.

The true signature piece of the album, however, is the Naomi Shemer classic, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav, which appears twice, in two very distinct renditions.

After her tour of duty in the army, Nourith went to France where she acquired much of her formal musical training. The languorous, evocative French styling is evident throughout much of the album.

Indeed, a number of the songs are sung in French. One song is sung in English. The core of the album, of course, is recorded in Nourith's mother tongue, Hebrew.

The result is an engaging listening experience, suitable for a quiet, restful, laid-back evening.

Nourith

Like Israel itself, Nourith's stylings are a unique joining of sounds, cultures and traditions, a synthesis of west and east.

Those sounds could be at home in the sweeping sands of the desert, in student coffee-klatsches, and even in the formalized atmosphere of the concert hall.

Nourith is, in a real sense, a musical mirror, an audio reflection of that synthesis.

Kol Yishama is a marvellous musical debut. And Nourith is an exciting musical talent.

Travel Talk

NEW YORK'S JEWISH MUSEUM

Unlike Jewish museums in some other cities, New York's Jewish Museum does not interpret its mandate in a parochial or strictly local fashion.

Since New York is the focus for the largest Jewish urban population in the Diaspora, this august institution on upper Fifth Avenue interprets its role globally, using lively exhibits, Judaic artifacts and objets d'art to convey the stirring epic of the Jewish people from 4,000 years ago to the present.

The museum's collection has grown tremendously over the years, at a pace that even somewhat seasoned tourists (such as myself) can observe.

The museum was founded in 1904, under the auspices of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, with a core of 26 books and manuscripts related to ceremonial and fine Jewish art.

In 1947, it moved into its current premises, the Warburg mansion on 1109 Fifth Avenue at 92nd St., a stately four-storey building that outwardly resembles a Gothic chateau. When these impressive quarters were extended and enlarged in the 1960s, the facility became the largest Jewish museum outside of Israel. Another major expansion occurred in 1993, doubling the museum's gallery space.

Last month, the museum's fourth floor, where the permanent collection begins, closed for renovations. After that floor is finished later this year, construction is slated to begin on the third floor. Although part of the museum's permanent collection will be temporarily inaccessible, the museum will remain open for visitors throughout all phases of renovation.

"We're updating it, changing the way it looks, and changing some of the content," says museum spokesperson Alex Wittenberg. "We'll have more display space for Chanukah lamps, for example, and there'll be a model of the entrance of King Solomon's Temple."

Previous visitors to the museum will recall the charming guided tour on tape narrated by Dustin Hoffman, which provided a cohesive, thoughtful, well-paced description of the museum's holdings. One could move through the entire permanent collection in as little as 45 minutes with the feeling of having gained something dramatic and valuable.

Hoffman's narration, alas, will be a casualty of the changes. Currently in production, a new audio tour will involve an interactive CD-ROM that will provide visitors with more overall information and more choices about what they want to hear.

Several interesting exhibits are set to open at the Jewish Museum.

Coming Oct. 17 to Feb. 6, 2000, is a collection of 12 portraits of the family of London art dealer Asher Wertheimer, painted by American artist John Singer Sargent between 1898 and 1908. The exhibition marks the first time the paintings have been shown as a group since they hung in the Wertheimers' residence more than 70 years ago.

Berlin Metropolis: Jews and the New Culture, 1890-1918, features some 250 paintings, sculptures, drawings, prints, books and other artifacts of turn-of-the-century Berlin, highlighting the role of the Jews in the development of modern culture in the German capital in those years. Originated at the Jewish Museum, this major exhibition opens Nov. 14 and runs thru April 23, 2000.

Museum admission, $8 adults. 212-423-3200. Web site, thejewish museum.org.

Capsule Reviews:

At 538 pages, The Great Jewish Cities of Central and Eastern Europe, by Eli Valley (Jason Aronson Inc.) is probably too big to pack into a carry-on bag. It's a great reference work, though, for before and after your trip to the cities of Prague, Warsaw, Krakow and Budapest.

Valley provides extensive histories of these main Jewish communities of Europe, delving into many diverse legends and asides, and offering guided tours of Jewish quarters and cemeteries, detailed maps, and thorough knowledge of the present kehillot.

The son of a New York rabbi, he gives full information on mikvahs, times of prayers in local synagogues, and where to find kosher food. The work also reflects a high knowledge of Jewish tradition and customs, as well as rabbinic lore.

Also of interest is A Short History of Jerusalem, by Abraham E. Millgram (Jason Aronson Inc.), whose 235 pages seem to relay a methodical, even-handed history of this "small city of 500,000 inhabitants, situated on a mountain in a remote part of the world," which is nonetheless the centre of three great world religions.

Montreal developer has the last laugh in Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They're not laughing anymore.

Seventeen years ago, when word seeped out that Montreal developer and architect David Joshua Azrieli planned to build what would be Israel's first enclosed, air-conditioned shopping mall, the howls of derision could be heard from Metulla to Eilat.

"According to local pundits, the project was bound to fail," recalls Azrieli, who immigrated to Canada in 1954 via Israel and Poland. "One newspaper headline read, 'The rise and fall of the first mall in Israel.'"

As he suggests, the skeptics had reason, perhaps, to be pessimistic. "The obstacles at that time were enormous because of the rampant inflation – up to 600 percent – and the collapse of the banking system.

Disregarding the odds, Azrieli realized his dream in 1985, building the Canion Ayalon in Ramat Gan, a suburb of Tel Aviv.

Since then, he has erected additional malls in Beersheba (1990) and Jerusalem (1993), which remain under his ownership and management, and bought an interest in three other malls. All have been "exceptionally profitable."

If imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, Azrieli can take satisfaction from the fact that some 20 malls have sprung up in Israel since the mid-1980s, thereby revolutionizing the Israeli retail trade.

The malls, he believes, have changed the relationship between the Israeli retailer and consumer by emphasizing customer service, politeness, beautifully designed stores and attractive merchandise displays.

"We've brought it up to Western standards," notes Azrieli, president of Canpro Investments Ltd., a company whose vast real estate holdings extend across North America.

Fate brought him to malls. As he puts it, "During one of my visits to Israel, the mayor of Ramat Gan, Israel Peled, showed me a site where the Canion Ayalon now stands and which was, literally, a heap of garbage surrounded by narrow roads. I saw an opportunity in that site. I enthusiastically embraced the project, built the mall and opened it to the public on time, in 18 months, as advertised. This feat in itself was a novelty in Israel."

Not one to rest on his laurels, he is currently completing what is billed as the largest mixed-use development in the Middle East. The $400 million plus Azrieli Centre is a striking complex that will eventually consist of a mall and three high-rise towers. It has been compared to Manhattan's Rockefeller Centre.

The mall and the triangular tower were opened last March and this past spring, respectively. The round building is expected to be finished next month. "The top floor will be used as an observatory," he explains. "On a clear day, you'll be able to see Tel Aviv and its outlying areas, the Judean mountains to the east, an open view of the Mediterranean Sea to the west, Herzliya and beyond to the north, and as far as Ashdod to the south."

David Joshua Azrieli

Construction of the fourth component, the square skyscraper, is scheduled to take several more years.

The centre, in his opinion, has already shaped Tel Aviv's skyline and become an architectural landmark. "I consider it to be my most significant and important project," says Azrieli, who launched his career rather modestly with the construction of four houses in the Montreal suburb of Ville D'anjou.

"It has been the most fulfilling of all my projects, one in which I have invested all my experience and skills, and one which attests to the confidence I have in the future of Tel Aviv and Israel. It is through the Azrieli Centre that I hope to contribute something of myself to Israel. In short, it is my testimony of the love for and commitment to Israel."

Azrieli, former national president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, adds: "My desire to work and participate in the building of Israel has never ceased. I have always sought out opportunities on how I could best contribute to the economy and welfare of Israel."

Born in Makow in 1922, a town near Warsaw, he and his three siblings were raised in comfortable circumstances. His father, Rafael Hirsh, was a manufacturer of ladies' coats and furs, and his mother, Sara Chaya, was a housewife. With the exception of his older brother, Efraim, who lives in Israel, Azrieli's family perished during the Holocaust. "I succeeded in escaping eastwards into Russia, and in a round-about way, I reached Israel in 1942."

The dramatic story of his escape, as written by his daughter Danna, a lawyer involved in his business, will be published in book form by Yad Vashem – the Holocaust museum in Jerusalem – later this autumn. An English edition will follow.

Azrieli's life in Israel was a combination of scholarship and war. He studied architecture at the Technion in Haifa, but when the War of Independence broke out in 1948, he joined the fledgling Israeli army, fighting with the Seventh Brigade in the costly battle for Latrun. When he was demobilized in 1949, he was an education officer in the air force.

Asked why he emigrated, he turned coy. "I don't really feel that I ever left Israel," says Azrieli, who typically spends three to four months of every year in the Jewish state. "My life took me to Canada, where I met my wife, Stephanie Lefcort, and where my children [Rafael, Sharon, Naomi and Danna] were born. However, I consider myself part of Israel."

Azrieli, whose net worth is estimated at $1.14 billion by Canadian Business, owns and manages more than 6.3 million square feet of commercial properties – shopping centres, office buildings and high-rise residences – in Canada, the United States and Israel.

His major property in Canada, in Gatineau across the river from Ottawa, is a 905,000 square-foot mall, Les Promenades de L'Outaouais, the biggest in the region.

At the end of 1997, Azrieli expanded his Israeli portfolio by acquiring three-quarters of the real estate arm of International Consultants Ltd., a subsidiary of Leumi & Company.

In a typical day, Azrieli spends two to three hours on the phone with his managers in Israel. "I am able to receive a complete report of the day's activities and events," he says. "I am able to participate in every aspect of the business, whether it is design, construction or management of the properties."

Modern technology helps him keep abreast. "The Internet has made it possible to send and receive drawings, documentation and so on, and to have an immediate input in every facet of the business."

He spends the rest of the day monitoring his interests in North America and tending to his philanthropy. A member of the Technion's and of Tel Aviv University's board of governors, Azrieli established the first graduate program in Holocaust studies at Concordia University in Montreal.

He also funded Yeshiva University's Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration and Tel Aviv University's School of Architecture and its chair in urban and environmental architecture.

At the Technion, his Alma Mater, Azrieli financed a chair in architecture and town planning. At Bar-Ilan University, he set up the Azrieli Institute for the Research in the Economy of Israel.

Apart from all this, Azrieli sits on the board of trustees of Jerusalem's Bezalel Academy of Arts & Design, and is a past member of the National Capital Commission in Ottawa.

Several years ago, Azrieli resumed his formal studies, taking a master's degree in architecture at Carleton University.

"Architecture has always been my true love," he muses. "I have been a student of architecture at some time or another, and consider myself to be up-to-date and very knowledgeable. I had always wanted to complete the formal aspect of my education in architecture. The opportunity presented itself when my workload slackened off in the second half of the 1990s. I decided to take two days a week for two years from my workload and totally submerge myself in my studies."

His commitment paid dividends. "This proved to be a most exhilarating and exciting time where I could detach myself from daily chores, attend classes, learn of the newest developments and techniques and add to my knowledge."

A collector of Judaica and Israeli art who enjoys excellent health, he has a few words of advice for those who wish to succeed in business.

"Do what you know best, what you love and enjoy most doing. And remain totally focused and positive in achieving your goals."

THE MAN IN WHITE AT THE WALL

A familiar worshipper at the Kotel in Jerusalem is the "man in white." Here we see him last week during Sukkot with the lulav and etrog in his hand.

Shaar Shalom captures baseball championship

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shaar Shalom Synagogue of Thornhill won the Inter-Synagogue Baseball League championship this year with a thrilling 20-19 win over Beth Sholom Synagogue

Junction Express, the team fielded by Keneseth Israel Congregation, in its first appearance in the league, won the consolation playoffs, defeating Beit Rayim Synagogue of Richmond Hill, 31-14

League commissioner Steve Warner of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue presented the championship trophy to Shaar Shalom co-captains Barry Krugel and Mendy Adler

The three-pitch softball league has been operating for 10 years. It plays its games Sunday mornings in five different municipal parks in Thornhill, Richmond Hill and Vaughan.

The Inter-Synagogue League is made up of seven teams from Conservative synagogues and five from Reform, including two teams from Temple Sinai.

Keneseth Israel dates back to 1911 when the Junction in the west end of Toronto had lots of Jewish residents. Fielding a team for Junction Express wasn't an easy task for Josh Kamen, 37, a Keneseth Israel member.

"I nearly gave up a couple of times," said Kamen, a North York high school teacher, who phoned everyone on the membership list provided by shul president Edwin Goldstein.

"One woman told me her husband would be glad to play but he's 80 years old. And another said her husband is on oxygen and couldn't take part in a game."

But this year's experience was so good that Junction Express will definitely field a team in the league next year, hoping to attract new members, Kamen said.

Keneseth Israel is an Ontario Heritage building with beautiful murals, which is kept up through the generosity of descendants of the original families who founded it.

With Orthodox-Conservative tradition and ritual, it holds services on the Jewish holidays and its members come from far and wide to attend services. A bountiful kiddush follows in all cases.

As for the new baseball team, "it's a fabulous experience to take part in the games," said Sheldon Usprech, 47, whose grandfather, Benjamin, was one of the founders of Keneseth Israel. His uncle, Harry, is the shul's gabbai.

Usprech, also a North York high school teacher, said the Junction Express represents a "nice mix" of members, young and old.

He said he was glad to meet opposing players in their 50s from other synagogues who were still enjoying the games.

"I used to play hockey and baseball, but I haven't done anything in an athletic way for seven years," Usprech said.

He comes from York Region to attend the services, he said, because this appeals to his sense of Jewish tradition.

Usprech's son, Peter, had his bar mitzvah there three years ago.

The Junction Express suits up in button top shirts with grey and black letters spelling out the team's name, and grey baseball caps. The uniforms were subsidized by team member Ken Kronis.

When prosecuting an alleged bribery injures fairness...

Once again, a senior politician is under police investigation in Israel. This time, former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu is suspected of having received free services from a local contractor who, over a three-year period, allegedly polished floors in the Netanyahus' private home, moved and stored their personal goods and received payment for a number of services.

The contractor was a personal friend and political supporter of the former prime minister. A bill for NIS 400,000 (about $140,000 Cdn) was submitted to the government, part of which was approved.

Naturally, this issue has become a political bonanza for people on all sides of the political spectrum. Clearly, opponents of Netanyahu on both the left and in his own party, are gleeful at the developments.

Loyalists claim that both the investigation and the ensuing police leaks from the interrogations are part of a campaign to discredit Netanyahu.

One issue which has been discussed is something of a legal curiosity, and it also arose the last time Netanyahu was investigated – the Bar-On Affair.

Readers may recall that Netanyahu was accused of trying to ram through the appointment of Ronnie Bar-On as attorney general (in Israel, a non-political post) in order to assist Shas leader Arieh Deri in his legal difficulties.

The alleged payoff was that Deri's Shas party supported the Hebron Agreement. While charges were never laid against Netanyahu, due to lack of evidence, it was recommended that Deri be charged with bribery.

This raised an interesting question – how could Deri be charged with bribery, if nobody was charged with taking a bribe? In other words, can there be a briber without a bribee?

If nobody took a bribe, was there a bribe? If not, how can the briber be charged?

In fact, Israeli law does recognize the possibility that a person can be charged with giving a bribe even though nobody took one. Thus, for example, recent case law supports the argument that a person can be charged with giving a bribe, even though nobody was charged with receiving one.

Opponents of this idea ask: how it is possible that there would be proof against the briber, without there being, automatically, sufficient proof against the recipient?

If we can prove that money, goods, services, etc. were given to someone in connection with his or her public office, in order to influence a specific action or just in order to find favor, clearly the recipient is guilty.

However, the Bar-On affair is a case in point. If the allegations are true, then Deri presumably offered to pass the Hebron Agreement in return for Netanyahu's intervention in his criminal case by appointing an attorney general who would be sympathetic to him.

Nonetheless, the prosecutor's office came to the conclusion that they could not prove Netanyahu knew the terms of the deal and acted because of them.

Regardless of one's position on this apparently arcane legal issue, one thing is abundantly clear. The more we witness cases in which people are sent to jail for bribery while the public officials go free, the more injury is done to people's sense of fairness, and to their belief that the justice system is truly blind to power and status.

Therefore, without presuming to address the current investigation, which is still under way and regarding which the facts are still not known, it would generally be advisable if the police and prosecutors were sensitive to this issue. Justice may be done by prosecuting the briber alone, but for many people, it is not seen to be done at all.

GRILLED MIXED PEPPER PASTA SALAD

1 lb. pasta (any shape)
peppers: 3 green, 2 red, 2 yellow, 1 orange halved, ribs removed, seeded 2 sweet onions, peeled, cut into 1" rings olive oil for brushing salt & pepper
cooking spray
1/4 cup balsamic vinegar
2 tblsp parsley, chopped
1 tblsp sugar
1/4 cup extra virgin olive oil
1 lb. mozzarella cheese, diced
1/2 cup parmesan cheese, grated

Cook pasta in boiling water. Rinse. Mix with small amount of olive oil to keep from sticking. Refrigerate until needed. Brush peppers and onion with olive oil, season with salt and pepper. Spray grill rack well with cooking spray. Grill peppers & onion until softened and well browned. Cut peppers into julienne. Cut onions in half. Combine with pasta in large bowl. In small bowl whisk balsamic vinegar, parsley & sugar. Season with salt & pepper. Whisking constantly, pour in oil. Pour over pasta & peppers. Add mozzarella & parmesan. Toss well to combine and serve immediately.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My name is Robbie and I have recently met a wonderful girl, Shauna. We have gone out together about half a dozen times and have really hit it off. Here is my dilemma.

Shauna lives on her own in an apartment. She has a disgusting, small, yappy dog, named Frostie. Let me tell you from the beginning, I am not a dog lover and never have been. Frostie has definitely come between Shauna and me, and I mean literally. When I try to put my arm around Shauna or, heaven forbid, try to kiss her, Frostie snarls, growls and goes for my throat.

Shauna laughs and thinks this is adorable. She says "Frostie is just trying to protect me, isn't he sweet?" I think she's lost it when it comes to this animal. I won't even describe to you how horrible it is when she lets that mutt lick her face and then expects me to kiss her. Yuck!! What's my next step?

Cold about Frostie

Dear Cold about Frostie

Robbie, you have to understand that Shauna has obviously formed a close bond with Frostie. She loves him dearly and thinks anything he does is adorable, much like an obnoxious child whose mother can't see the offensiveness of the child's behavior.

Animals play an important role in people's hearts and homes. They become your friend, your company, they make you laugh and give you unconditional love.

I'm explaining this so you will understand where Shauna is coming from.

Frostie, however should never be allowed to snarl or attack anyone. It is anything but cute. I suggest you talk to Shauna about how uncomfortable it is for you to come to her home when Frostie behaves this way, but at the same time offer some suggestions to help her through this problem.

She can close him in a room with a toy or a treat of some kind to occupy him. However, that is just a Band-Aid. What she really needs to do is train him not to snarl and go for people when they approach her. It is considered poor behavior and should not be tolerated.

There are many private trainers or schools for dogs that can help Shauna and Frostie with this problem. Maybe you can offer your help as well. Who knows, with enough time you might end up loving Frostie too!

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Israel ties to Austria may suffer, Levy says

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel will "reassess" its relations with Austria and may even break off diplomatic ties with Vienna if the "neo-Nazi" Freedom party is brought into the new government coalition in Austria, Foreign Minister David Levy stated last week.

Levy, who was speaking in the Knesset, said his statement on the reassessment of relations "is not a hint – it is a sharp, clear message."

Asked afterward by reporters if Israel will consider severing diplomatic relations with Austria, he replied: "That could also happen. It is a possibility."

Please see related story on page 35

The far-right Freedom party, led by Jorg Haider, finished second in national elections earlier this month in Austria, garnering more than 27 percent of the votes.

Levy made a direct appeal to the Austrians: "Do not bring this neo-Nazi element into your government."

He said the results of the Austrian elections "demonstrate a worrisome and revolting phenomenon as to the opinions, world-view and insensitivity of the citizens of Austria."

The Austrian Foreign Ministry said it "has taken note of" Levy's statement and "will study it."

Prime Minister Ehud Barak said the strengthening of the extreme right party in Austria must be a "red light for us all."

Minister of regional co-operation Shimon Peres, citing the results of the elections, cancelled a planned visit to Vienna next week, during which he was to deliver a lecture in memory of former chancellor Bruno Kreisky.

"Austria is an anti-Semitic country and the election results prove it," said former Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, himself Austrian-born, in an interview on a private Austrian radio station.

LITTLE CELL, LOTS OF ENERGY

A revolutionary, new battery made its debut recently in Israel. A 1.5 volt caseless 0.5 mm flexible and ultra-thin battery with a variety of applications in the microelectronics market was showcased earlier this month in Tel Aviv. Baruch Levanon, chief executive of the two-year-old company Power-Paper, said the battery can be manufactured in any shape and size and is environmentally friendly. [RNS/Reuters photo]

The News in Brief

CANADA

CJC Meets Premiers

CHARLOTTETOWN — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen and executive vice-president Jack Silverstone met recently with Prince Edward Island Premier Pat Binns and later, in Halifax, with Premier John Hamm of Nova Scotia. The talks centred around hate on the Internet, the proposed Holocaust museum in Ottawa, commemorating Yom Hashoah and Holocaust education in schools.

Executive Director Named

WINNIPEG — Businessman Izzy Asper, chair and president of the Asper Foundation, has appointed Moe Levy as the foundation's executive director. Levy has been CEO and president of the Winnipeg Fur Exchange since 1993, and tallies a long history of involvement in business and management. The Asper Foundation was established in 1983 as a private, charitable foundation.

Segal Addresses CCCJ

TORONTO — Hugh Segal, former chief of staff to Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, Tory leadership contender and longtime Conservative strategist, was the guest speaker at the recent annual meeting of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. Segal warned against an atmosphere of defeatism, which he said can lead to the kind of racist and xenophobic rhetoric coming from U.S. presidential hopeful Pat Buchanan.

ISRAEL

Agent Goes On Trial

JERUSALEM — A former agent for the Shin Bet domestic security service has gone on trial for allegedly failing to prevent the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Avishai Raviv, code-named "Champagne" by the Shin Bet, pleaded not guilty this month to the charges. Raviv was recruited by the Shin Bet in 1987 to gather information on far right-wing activities.

Ad Blitz Launched

JERUSALEM — The Conservative and Reform movements in Israel are reportedly planning new ad campaigns to draw followers to their synagogues. The campaigns are planned for Passover, following a media blitz by the two movements before Rosh Hashanah.

Slave Laborers File Suit

JERUSALEM — Israelis who worked as child slave laborers for the Nazi war effort filed a class-action lawsuit for "deprivation of childhood" in a U.S. court. The lawsuit came as discussions of a German compensation fund for ex-slave laborers are expected to resume in Washington. A lawyer for the plaintiffs said the lawsuit, in which the plaintiffs are asking for $75,000 per victim, was filed independently of those talks.

New Excavations

JERUSALEM — Israel launched new archeological excavations near the Temple Mount, which both Muslims and Jews claim as holy ground. The move by Prime Minister Ehud Barak is seen as symbolic, demonstrating his strength in peace negotiations with Palestinians.

WORLD

Cemetery Vandalized

BERLIN — A violent attack on Europe's largest Jewish cemetery has left 103 stones overturned, nearly a quarter of them irreparably damaged. Police are investigating the incident at eastern Berlin's Weissensee cemetery, which contains more than 100,000 stones. A local stonemason firm, hearing the news on the radio, offered to do repairs free of charge.

Gore Slams Buchanan

WASHINGTON — U.S. Vice President Al Gore has urged Republicans to repudiate Pat Buchanan's view that Adolf Hitler posed no threat to the United States, and that America would have been better off not entering World War II. In a statement, Gore called Buchanan's views an insult to Americans who gave their lives during the war.

Fund Nearly Paid Out

BERN — A Swiss humanitarian fund set up in 1997 to benefit needy Holocaust survivors announced that it had allocated more than 90 percent of its cash. The announcement came as the deadline for claims expired Oct. 1.

Babi Yar Service

MOSCOW — Jewish activists joined Ukrainian leaders for a memorial Sept. 29 honoring the memory of Jews slaughtered at a ravine near Kiev. Nazi forces killed more than 33,000 at Babi Yar in two days in September 1942.

Casino Buys Painting

LAS VEGAS — A Las Vegas casino recently purchased a Nazi-looted painting that had been returned to the heirs of a Jewish art collector. The Bellagio resort added Henri Matisse's Odalisque to its art collection in the casino.

In June, the Seattle Art Museum returned the work, valued at $2 million, to the heirs of Paul Rosenberg after it had hung in the museum for years.

Gloved One Goes to Shul

NEW YORK — It was only fitting that when Michael Jackson attended Shabbat services in New York, he would choose a synagogue known for its lively singing and dancing.

Jackson, the reclusive pop star best known for early 1980s hits such as Billie Jean and Beat It, showed up at Manhattan's Carlebach Shul Oct. 1, accompanied by a few security guards and Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, author of the bestseller, Kosher Sex.

Jackson was not available for comment, but reportedly told Rabbi Boteach the service at the Orthodox shul was one of the most spiritual experiences of his life.

Jackson is not planning to convert to Judaism, but was interested in attending a Jewish service, explained Rabbi Boteach, who met Jackson through mutual friend Uri Geller. Geller, the Israeli psychic famous for his ability to bend spoons, also attended the service.

Jackson "was swaying right along as if he were a Chassid," said the shul's rabbi, Samuel Intrator.

"When I was teaching Torah later, he was again swaying along and listening," the rabbi said. "He seemed very spiritual from what I saw."

Quebec urged to create new religious schools

'Para-public' would be largely government funded

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec should create "para-public" religious schools, which are neither fully public nor private, yet largely government-funded, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Quebec region, has proposed at the public hearings on the place of religion in schools.

CJC presents a model of a three-stream educational system, consisting of publicly-funded secular schools, with no religious content or orientation; private schools, either secular or religious; and the para-public religious schools, whether Catholic, Protestant, Jewish or other.

The latter would satisfy the belief of those parents, including "the vast majority" of Jewish parents, that "the school is a central place for the transmission of religious values," the CJC brief states.

These schools would teach the régime pédagogique, prescribed by the Education Ministry, as well as an integrated religious component, much in the way the Jewish day schools now do, CJC says. The difference is the government should fully fund "at least" the secular part of the curriculum.

"Our current network of Jewish day schools, which provides an illustration of this model, would be maintained and could serve as an interesting example for others. Subject to the expression of parents' wishes, some existing public schools might opt to affiliate with this system," CJC says.

Today, the Jewish day schools are classified as private, and the government pays only about half the cost of the secular curriculum, while Jewish studies is paid for entirely by parents.

CJC cites section 41 of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights as the basis for its argument in favor of state funding of religious schools. The charter, it says, "requires – and we believe that Quebecers' respect for religious diversity demands – that parents have the right to choose a school with a religious orientation for their children."

(Section 41 states that parents have a right to require that, in the public schools, their children receive a religious education in conformity with their convictions.)

The majority of public schools, however, should "not impose religious instruction or values," CJC says. "Any sort of religious programming at these schools should be offered outside school hours, at no cost to the state."

According to CJC, this means not only the curriculum should be secular, but "the school atmosphere, in all facets, must be pluralistic and must not reflect, in any way, a specific religious orientation."

The public hearings are being held by a parliamentary commission, following the tabling of a report by Université de Montréal professor Jean-Pierre Proulx, which calls for the secularization of all public schools and an end to the historic privileges of Catholics and Protestants in the system.

The report, Religion in Secular Schools: A New Perspective for Quebec, says one standard compulsory course on religions from a cultural perspective should be taught in all schools, at both the elementary and secondary levels.

Any specific religious content should be extra-curricular and at the expense of parents. That option should be made available to all religious groups, the report says.

Although school boards based on denomination – Catholic or Protestant – were abolished in July, 1998 and replaced by language-based ones, individual schools continue to have the right to designate themselves Catholic, Protestant or secular, according to parents' wishes.

All students, however, have the option of taking a Catholic, Protestant or secular-moral education, whatever the orientation of the school.

The report concludes that the present system is discriminatory because of the advantages accorded Catholics and Protestants, and violates both the Canadian and Quebec Charters of Rights.

To create linguistic boards, section 93 of the 1867 British North America Act was amended to repeal the application in Quebec of denominational rights in schooling. Legally, the current situation can only exist by Quebec's invoking the notwithstanding

The defence of self

Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu breezed into downtown Toronto last week, the main attraction of the Speakers Forum, an occasional lunch-time lecture series aimed primarily at Toronto's business community. Approximately 800 people paid $85 each to hear the former prime minister.

He spoke for nearly an hour, off the cuff as it were, without the benefit of a prepared text and then also answered a handful of questions.

It was a gathering of kindred souls. More than once during the course of his remarks, Netanyahu reminded the large assembly of his MIT credentials.

Ontario premier Mike Harris introduced the keynote speaker in enthusiastically admiring tones and that set the stage. From the very outset, it was apparent to everyone that Netanyahu was in his element. He looked relaxed, sounded authoritative and exuded confidence.

The content of Netanyahu's ensuing presentation was quite unremarkable, especially for those of us familiar with the issues and with the political context of Israeli life.

What was remarkable however, was the ease and the efficient, professorial calm by which he communicated to the audience.

Early on in the presentation, he walked out from behind the lectern because the audience "was too far away" and approached the very edge of the dais platform.

It was from there, as close as possible to his listeners, pacing back and forth, reinforcing his varied messages with emphatic body language like an animated teacher in front of a packed lecture hall of attentive students, that the former prime minister spoke to the assembly.

Moving to the front of the stage was a stroke of stylistic brilliance. It softened the edges of the formalized barriers of the venue without actually breaking them. The speaker retained his authority while adding a measure of folksiness. Moreover, it sent forward the unspoken but unmistakable signal that here was a man supremely secure in himself and with his message.

That message, ostensibly, was to be about the essence of modern leadership. In truth, however, Netanyahu spoke about the essence of his specific leadership as prime minister. It was a defence of self.

"True leadership," the former prime minister began, "is always about struggle. One must have a set of values and ideals, and then be willing to stand up to fight for them."

Two principles, Netanyahu said, were the cornerstones of his beliefs and the driving force of his policies during his term as prime minister:

• the key to peace was security;
• the key to prosperity was freedom.

Thus, he divided his remarks, a personalized retrospective of his prime ministerial record, into the realm of the peace process and economic policy.

On the peace process, he repeated to this Canadian audience what he had often told a domestic, Israeli audience: a peace treaty must be anchored in security, otherwise it amounts only to a piece of paper but not to a reciprocally enforceable contract.

Relying on the authority of the philosopher Immanuel Kant, Netanyahu was pleased to advise the audience that his government's policies "had laid the foundation for a peace that will last."

Though the audience listened politely and carefully to the former premier's review of his political record, they perked up considerably and listened very intently when the subject moved on to the economic record.

Netanyahu passionately described the necessary relationship between maximum individual freedoms and maximum societal prosperity.

His economic policies, Netanyahu suggested, had been designed with this relationship in mind. The policies were fivefold:

• the deficit was reduced from 5 percent to 2 percent of the GDP;
• inflation was reduced from 15 percent to 3 percent;
• a program of privatization of major government assets was begun;
• as was a program of deregulation of certain industrial sectors; and
• the Israeli currency was freed to find its competitive value relative to other currencies.

Netanyahu acknowledged that the "cost" of his economic program was a "temporary" increase in unemployment, and that it was the unemployment, which, as "the principal issue of the election" led to his electoral defeat.

And, as he was prepared to fight for his beliefs, his audience also believed that he was prepared to live with the results of the fight.

JF&CS reports 5% hike in child abuse, neglect

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Incidents of physical abuse and neglect reported to the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) have increased by five percent in three years, according to Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services.

Hurwitz spoke last week at a City Hall press conference promoting media awareness of child abuse. October is child abuse prevention month.

In 1996, 425 allegations of child abuse, which include physical and sexual abuse and neglect, were reported to JF&CS. In 1998, there were 444 cases reported. Abuse was confirmed in only nine percent of the cases.

That does not mean there was no abuse in 91 percent of the cases, said Hurwitz, but is rather a reflection of JF&CS's inability to verify abuse in all circumstances.

Other children's aid societies have also noticed an increase in reports of physical abuse and neglect.

From April to August 1998, Catholic Children's Aid Society of Toronto reported an increase of about 11.6 percent in the number of reported cases of neglect and abuse.

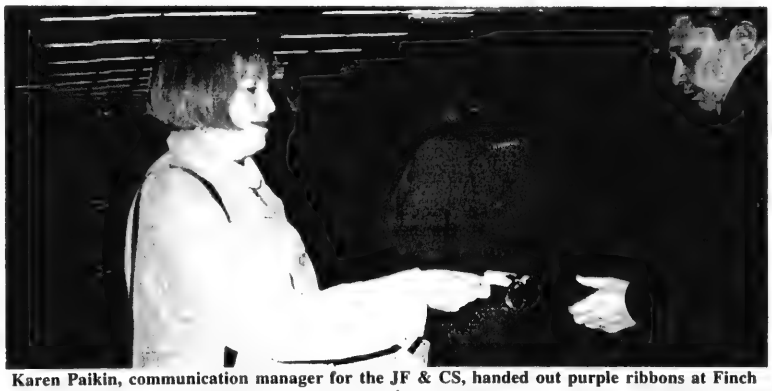
The Children's Aid Society of Toronto has experienced a 17 percent increase in demand for their services, said spokesperson Cathy Breton.

It is hoped that amendments passed in May to the Child and Family Services Act will lead to an increase in cases reported.

The amendments will make it easier for children's aid societies to get involved when they believe a child is at risk, said Hurwitz.

"In the old act, you had to have substantial grounds that the child was at risk or had been hurt, or you had to have proof the child had been abused," Hurwitz said.

With the legislative changes, social workers will be able to intervene even if they only suspect abuse has occurred or could occur, or there are concerns of neglect, he said.



Karen Paikin, communication manager for the JF & CS, handed out purple ribbons at Finch subway station in North York last week as part of a campaign to raise awareness of child abuse.

"With neglect, you don't always have concrete physical signs of harm, as you would with physical abuse, so the social worker can use his or her critical judgement to determine whether there are other risk factors besides just abuse," Hurwitz said.

Hit-and-run arrest

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Police made an arrest last week in the Sept. 24 hit-and-run death of Moshe Nussbaum, after a man turned himself in.

As well, a black 1998 Chevrolet Blazer was seized for forensic tests.

Nussbaum, 88, died after being hit by a car in the Bathurst-Wilson area, on his way to morning services at Agudath Israel Synagogue, which he had helped found.

Bernard Rivero, 40, of Bathurst Street, appeared in court last week and was granted bail. He will reappear in court Nov. 14, charged with one count of failure to remain at the scene of an accident.

Police said Nussbaum's family seemed relieved at the news of an arrest.

Police are still awaiting the results of forensic tests conducted on a black GMC Jimmy that was seized earlier after it had been brought to an autobody shop for front-end repairs.

Police said hairs and tissue were found on the first car's front frame.

Nussbaum was the 13th person in Toronto to die in a hit-and-run accident this year. A 14th victim died last week.

Officials say the number of hit-and-run deaths is unusually high this year. Normally, there are two or three annually.

Anti-racist protesters greet Icke

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Demonstrators protest David Icke's talk last week at Hart House.

TORONTO — Protesters yelling "Shame" at the entrance to Hart House Theatre did not deter almost 400 audience members from attending a five-hour lecture by David Icke.

The controversial British New Age speaker, who lectured last Wednesday evening under the auspices of Sumari Seminars, maintains he is not anti-Semitic, despite the outcry against him from Jewish community members and others.

Prior to his talk, a crowd of about 50 demonstrators gathered outside the theatre on the University of Toronto's (U of T) downtown campus, chanting slogans like "Icke, Icke, Icke, take a hike, hike, hike!" and "Hate speech is not free speech."

At least one person in the audience, a member of a visible minority, was unfazed by the racism allegations. "I heard a lot of good things about him," she told The CJN. "I think there might be a little bit of truth. A lot of the people are interested in what he has to say. He should be allowed to say it, and we should be allowed to listen to it."

The audience ranged from young to middle-aged and several nodded in agreement as Icke spoke. There were also two officers from the Metropolitan Toronto Police hate crime unit, who are currently investigating Icke's books; officials from Immigration Canada; and about half a dozen Jewish Defence League members.

U of T student Sarah Zelcer, an equity studies major, took part in the protest because she believes it's important to have an anti-racist presence at the event. She would also like to see a public forum at which members of the Jewish community or others could "pick apart [Icke's] points one by one."

Student protesters included representatives of the university's Students' Administrative Council, its Jewish Students' Union and the Jewish fraternity Alpha Omega Pi.

Icke's writings are "anti-Semitic, make no mistake about it," Richard Warman, Green Party of Ontario representative, told the group.

Warman had travelled from Ottawa to join party leader Frank de Jong in disassociating the party from Icke, a former member of the U.K. Green party. According to a flyer handed out in front of the theatre, Icke "did extensive damage to the credibility of the U.K. Greens with his anti-Semitic writings and claims to be a son of god."

De Jong stood at the theatre entrance with a sign reading, "Racist speaker. Please do not go in the theatre."

Also on hand was Liberal attorney general critic Michael Bryant, who had called on Jim Flaherty, Ontario's attorney general, to investigate and potentially prosecute Icke for hate crimes.

Liberals call on AG to investigate speaker

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, both noted that with freedom of speech comes academic responsibility.

Farber called Icke's writings "the worst anti-Semitic garbage I have ever read."

Earlier in the day, U of T president Robert Prichard defended his decision to allow Icke to speak. Freedom of expression is a value the university is committed to, "even when the expression of the speech is deeply offensive, as is clear in this case," Prichard said in an interview on CBC Radio.

Icke came to Toronto following two weekend talks in Hull, Que. Protests from local Green Party members and Jewish community representatives resulted in the cancellation of his talk by at least four venues in the Ottawa area before the eventual location was finalized.

A talk at the Windsor Casino was also cancelled.

In his Toronto appearance – which lasted more than five hours, with one brief intermission – Icke discussed bizarre conspiracy theories about the world being ruled by a small group, composed of the descendants of reptiles and aliens. They supposedly invaded Earth and interbred with humans.

In his writings, he makes more pointed references to Jews and Judaism, denouncing the Talmud as "racist," and focusing on a "global elite" that includes the Rothschild banking family and former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger.

Icke mentioned Jews specifically only at the beginning of his talk, referring to the controversy here. "Don't let anyone think [I've] changed [my] talk because of the controversy," he said.

Referring to his conspiracy theories, he asked, "Is it a Jewish plot?"

"No, no, no!" he yelled. "Is it a plot? Yes, yes, yes," he said firmly.

Most people, including journalists, he believes, are victims of a herd mentality.

Icke is clever, said Danny Roth, public affairs and communications director, CJC, Ontario region, who monitored the talk at the invitation of Sumari Seminars. "He's soft spoken, photogenic, he kibitzes, he's got a soft sell."

Roth believes the danger lies in Icke's subtlety. "People may not see him for what he is, and go out and buy the book."

Intemperate

Many people, justifiably, may question the wisdom of convening a multi-nation conference on the subject of federalism virtually on the doorstep of the one provincial government intent on bringing down the Canadian federation. Did the conference planners expect the Parti Québécois (PQ) would let the occasion pass without imparting its own views on federalism to representatives from some 25 countries?

But still, one could have been excused for expecting the premier of Quebec to conduct himself with civility if not courtesy during the proceedings last week. Such expectations, however, proved chimeral.

In the bombastic, demagogic style that has become his trademark, Lucien Bouchard told a gathering of 600 conference delegates that the Canadian government was treating Quebec "brutally," that it was trying "to bring Quebec to its knees," that it was "engaged in a concerted strategy of trivializing Quebec," and so on.

Canadians have become used to hearing these dark depictions of our national union by the premier of Quebec, though they still bruise. To the delegates from foreign shores, however, the barrage of Bouchardian asperities must have sounded strange indeed, intemperate, excessive, obsessive and contradicted by all that they saw with their very own eyes.

Inexcusable

The day prior to the outburst by Bouchard, his minister for intergovernmental affairs, Joseph Facal, told the National Post that his government's approach to separatism excludes the rule of law. "The question of Quebec sovereignty is a political question not a legal question," Facal told his interviewer. "The priority should be given to the clear expression of the democratic will (our emphasis) of a majority of the people," he said later in the interview.

PQ officials talk of a "democratic will" that is devoid of the rule of law; in fact they are talking not of democracy, but rather, at its most benign, of a kind of self-righteous authoritarianism.

The irreducible underpinning of all democracies and of all democratic government is the rule of law. It is inexcusable for the government of Quebec to peddle a contrary notion of democracy.

Incomprehensible

The vanity of a person whose voice no one wants to hear anymore can lead her to utter incomprehensible pronouncements. Such was the situation last week when Margaret Thatcher inveighed against the legal process in which Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet is currently embroiled. The "staunch and true friend" of Britain, as Lady Thatcher described Pinochet, was the controlling hand behind the murder or disappearance of thousands of Chileans. Is that the hand she would have her countrymen embrace?

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

Iraqi Jews did not lack food and water

Re: "The Iraqi Jews of Toronto." (CJN, Sept. 30) I was very much offended when it was reported, for example, that the Jews in Iraq "lived in huts without food and water." I respond by saying with pride that not one single Jew lived in a hut in Iraq at any point of time. There was never a shortage of food or water, at least until the start of the Gulf war in 1991. Iraq is rich with oil resources and has two great rivers that supply water. Food was plenty in every house.

When I talked to Jerry Gladman, I was actually referring to the time of the mass exodus of the Iraqi Jews to Israel in 1951. Israel was not ready at that time to absorb such a large number of immigrants.

Spend Auschwitz synagogue funds in Israel

During a recent visit to my native Montreal, I read several issues of The CJN, a part of my weekly routine that I miss doing since my aliyah nearly seven years ago. I would like to comment on the closing statement of Joseph Lupka's letter (Opposes spending, CJN, July 15).

In my opinion, the money allocated for a synagogue near the Auschwitz death camp should be spent in Israel, not North America.

Using a similar note of discontent, why rebuild in the Diaspora, when we finally have a Jewish homeland, despite the efforts of the Nazis? Why not use these funds to instil a love of the land to Jews worldwide? Establish a scholarship program whose participants would travel to Israel in order to experience it firsthand through a series of seminars and workshops?

I am a grandchild of Holocaust survivors from Pabianice, Poland (near Lodz), and fully agree with the point made by Sholem Hershkop (Yiddish Vinkel, CJN, June 17), whereby he takes a stand against the building of a synagogue near the death camp in Auschwitz.

Offer to visit parents of South African Jews

The Grand Lodge of the Hebrew Order of David International is embarking on an international project that could be of interest to ex-South African members living outside of South Africa.

The brethren of the Hebrew Order of David International in South Africa will, where possible, visit parents of brethren who have emigrated, and periodically report back to their families.

Former brethren of the Hebrew Order of David International now living in Canada who wish their parents to be visited are invited to either contact Max Skuy in Toronto at 905-709-8179, or send full details, to The Grand Secretary, W/Bro. Con Travis on e-mail at itsadeal@netactive.co.za.

Disney's Epcot Centre must show Jerusalem as capital

We must stand united.

When I fought for the State of Israel while a resident in the '50s and '60s, our leaders were of sterner stuff; they made us proud! Now we are in fear of upsetting a "peace process" that is a lie!

The Arab block: Egypt, Arafat, the Gulf States, the Arab League, U.S. and international Muslim groups, and Disney have combined to prevent Israel from declaring Jerusalem its capital.

In fact Michael Eisner, Disney's CEO, has promised his Euro Disney partner, Saudi billionaire Prince Alwaleed Bin Talal, that the Israel Pavilion at Epcot Centre in Florida will definitely not depict Jerusalem as our capital.

The government of Israel, the Jewish community in Israel and elsewhere must not surrender to these gangsters' demands.

We must publicly invite visitors to the Israel Pavilion at Disney's Epcot Centre with Jerusalem as Israel's capital, to enjoy the sights, sounds, entertainment, and food products of the Holy Land.

Come say shalom!

Cardinal's letter does not atone for price paid

With tears in my eyes, and a big appreciation, I read the letter sent to Jews by Cardinal O'Connor. (Rabbi Gunther Plaut's column, CJN, Sept. 30) But we, the witnesses of the horrors and the survivors of the Holocaust realize what price we have paid for this letter.

Perspectives

Business ethics are a religious issue too

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

The past 50 years have witnessed an amazing transformation of Jewish life in North America. We have succeeded in transforming the treife medinah (unkosher land) into a land filled with yeshivot, Torah tapes, chesed organizations, glatt kosher food, mikvaot and daf yomi classes.

However, there does appear to be one major area where increased observance of and dedication to the details of halachah still elude us. I refer to the general category of business ethics, the section which occupies the most space in the code of Jewish law.

Unfortunately, all too often (once is too often), we hear about ritually observant Jews involved in white collar crimes: tax evasion, money laundering, embezzlement and fraud.

Perhaps even worse is the attitude that one so often hears in casual conversation. "I am only an employee, so I can't write off any personal expenses," or "Of course I pay my contractor in cash," thereby helping him evade his tax responsibility and thus stealing from the honest taxpayer. In an era where increased stringency has become the norm in so many ritual areas, why is it that leniency is the norm in our money dealings?

For some, the phenomenon is culturally based. Unfortunately, many people hail from areas where Jews were actively and legally discriminated against. Thus, to level the playing field, Jews had to resort to cheating. This attitude was then carried over to our democracies.

I do not wish to suggest that our behavior in this crucial area is worse than that of any other group. However, it does not require a very close examination of our general business practices to realize that a serious problem exists.

Judaism equates silence with acquiescence. Those who have the ability to address a problem but do not do so are equally culpable in the eyes of the Lord. It is in this spirit that I put in writing some of my own personal observations, based on my experiences as a chartered accountant and a pulpit rabbi, and discussions with friends and colleagues.

We were all created with a natural love of material possessions. This has many positive features. If not for our desire to make money, people would cease to build, thereby making society as a whole poorer. However, our inclination for more, more and more often leads us astray. The Talmud declares that (as with gossip and sexual impropriety) everybody sins somewhat in the area of money. The problem is exacerbated by the high cost of leading a Jewishly meaningful life adding to the temptation. Furthermore it is so easy to get away with it. The plethora of "cash only" businesses, combined with the extremely remote possibility of getting caught, make the temptation too great for many. This combination of (perceived) need, greed and easy access is hard to overcome.

The problem, though, goes beyond the personal desire for money. Our society idolizes material success. Hence, even people who don't need the money to make ends meet are tempted to cheat.

Even our religious institutions unwittingly contribute to this problem. When was the last time you saw a teacher being honored at a dinner? How many buildings are named for social workers who have devoted their lives to Jews in need?

Although many religious institutions will refrain from honoring those who disregard ritual norms, it is the rare one that will apply the same standards to ethical norms. Thus, there is no social ostracization of those who neglect this crucial area of Jewish life. Unfortunately the problem is so widespread and accepted that those who follow the ethical norms of the Torah in this area are often viewed as naive simpletons.

People have often complained to me that I speak on the issue of business ethics too often. One member of my synagogue even told me that by speaking out on the subject I make it more difficult to attract members to the shul. Once society accepts a norm, it becomes difficult to change. After all, if everybody does it, it can not really be wrong.

In this painting of Moses with the Tablets of the Law by Joos van Ghent (1410-1475), Moses emphasizes the law by pointing to it. The author of this essay also "points" to the law by urging that its ritual observance be tied to its ethical observance as well.

We live in a society that distinguishes between private activity and public life, a distinction which in many ways is foreign to Judaism. However its effects are clearly felt within the Jewish world. Much of the increased observance we have thankfully witnessed has focused on areas that are external and visible to others. Business activity generally takes place away from our religious environment and very few of our brethren have any idea what our standards are. Hence there is no religious norm to conform to.

A further distinction that people incorrectly make is the one between ritual and ethic. We have compartmentalized our lives into religious and secular components. Unfortunately, people then classify business activities in the secular component, which is somehow divorced from religious norms. We have failed to integrate all of our activities into a religious framework. The basic notion that Judaism does not recognize anything as being secular – there are only varying levels of holiness – has been ignored.

Ethics to many, just is not a Jewish issue; after all there is (apparently) nothing distinctly Jewish about this issue. In an era where religiosity is often defined by the number of cultural barriers that are erected, those areas where we have some degree of commonality with other groupings tend to be neglected.

Reinforcing the notion that business ethics is not a religious issue is the fact that rarely do our rabbis speak on this subject. Perhaps with the paucity of Jewish life after the war, it was understandable that religious energies would be devoted to kashrut, Shabbat, mikvaot and Jewish education. Perhaps rabbis naively thought that ethics would come naturally to a Jew.

It was inconceivable that a Jew who would sacrifice economic gain in order to keep Shabbat, thereby showing his faith in the Creator, would show total lack of faith in the ability of God to provide economically for us. This is why the first question asked to us by God after 120 years is Nasata v'natata b'emunah? (Did you deal faithfully in business?) The question is asking more than how honest we were in business; it is asking whether our dealings were conducted with faith in God as our ultimate provider.

Even on those occasions when rabbis speak out, they are often ignored. The perception is that the rabbinic leadership does not really understand the business world, that they are living in an ivory tower detached from the real world.

We must make things perfectly clear. A Jew who is ethically wanting, no matter how meticulous in his relations with God, is not a religious Jew.

Much more important than the diagnosis of the problem is finding a cure. While the evil inclination will continue to resist efforts to curb its appetite for money, this yetzer hara can be "defeated" as we challenge it for productive purposes. Not so long ago, everybody, including observant Jews themselves, thought that traditional Judaism could not survive in America and were thankfully proven wrong. Similarly a concerted effort to address this problem is bound to have positive results. The first step towards a solution is recognizing the gravity of the problem and the centrality of the issue to the definition of being an observant Jew.

It is time to make this issue a priority. We must teach and re-teach the basic Jewish values of honesty, full disclosure and integrity in all of our dealings. Our rich heritage includes such teachings as these: the flood happened because of the sin of robbery; the first question that God will ask us in the afterlife is whether our business dealings were conducted honestly; it is a biblical obligation to follow the civil laws of your country of residence; due to dishonest weights, Amalek comes (Midrash cited by Rashi Devarim 25:17); robbery is "more difficult" than adultery (Baba Batra 88b); God abhors social sins but can tolerate idolatry (see commentary of Meshech Chochmah to Exodus 14:24).

We must stress the notion that our prophets have told us over and over again that God does not want absent social ethics; in fact, He even despises our sacrifices (Isiah 1). And we all know that prayer has replaced sacrifices.

Furthermore, the notion of potential chillul HaShem, desecration of God's name must be stressed. When a Jew who is ritually observant cheats, people are turned off from Judaism and God's name is desecrated. The Talmud implies that if one is going to violate Judaism's ethical norms, then it would be better that one not be ritually observant either (see Talmud Yoma 85a). The inconsistency brings disrepute to the perfect Torah that we have corrupted.

Rabbis must speak out on the subject forcefully and consistently (notwithstanding that it may upset some members of the congregation). Clear legal rulings must be issued that forbid both the operation and patronization of cash only businesses, reminding people that all items must be declared at customs, that it is wrong to delay payment of bills, that window-dressing financial statements is a forbidden practice.

We must not allow those whose business practices are not up to Torah standards to be held as role models for a Torah lifestyle. We must ensure that all our activities are conducted in a manner that will result in a kiddush HaShem. We must continue to work until people stop and say: "What a wonderful Torah the Jewish people have, look at the honesty and integrity of those who keep it."

Rabbi Jay Kelman, a chartered accountant, is associate rabbi of Beth Jacob V'anshei Dridz congregation in Toronto, and along with his wife Ilana, is the local coordinator of the Toronto Torah Ethics Project.

Opinions

A man for all faiths

On the evening of Nov. 1, Holy Blossom and the community at large will have the opportunity of greeting an extraordinary guest. He is one of the few of whom it can be said without reservation that he has changed the face of Canada.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Strange, therefore, that he has not become a household name amongst the masses, though amongst those who know the inner workings of Canadian society, he is a star.

He is the one who, some years ago, was able to direct public awareness to different goals and, at the same time, win the support of the most prestigious scientists in the land.

The 72-year-old Torontonian who has managed such rare exploits, Dr. Fraser Mustard, is the person primarily responsible for recognizing the vital importance of early child development.

He was able to demonstrate scientifically that the very earliest chapters in our lives are decisive for our future. He not only published his findings in scientific magazines, but he took them, so to speak, to the very streets of the country. He is a born activist, and his capacity to persuade people has been extraordinary.

Today, he serves as president of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research and is co-chair of the Early Years Learning Study (established by the government of Ontario).

Understanding that scientific results alone do not ensure change, Mustard campaigns relentlessly to raise the consciousness of communities and governments across Canada about the high cost to society when it fails to provide a nurturing environment in early childhood.

For his efforts, he has received not only a trunkful of awards and honors – amongst them 15 honorary degrees – but also the reputation of "a humanitarian street fighter."

What, then, should we do? Mustard thinks that we must begin to reorder our national priorities and, above all, consider the youngest element in our society as our most valuable resource.

He is convinced that our traditional view, which stresses Canada's natural resources, is partial, ineffective and, in the long run, counter-productive.

"There is a change taking place in the world, and historically nations who have failed to capture that change generally have had difficulty sustaining their tolerance or their specific qualities," Mustard says.

On Nov. 1, this outstanding Canadian, whose name is known to cognoscenti all over the world, will receive the Humanitarian Award that Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto bestows every other year. Mustard is not a Jew but is a man for all faiths.

I have a very particular reason to be glad that Mustard has agreed to accept the award from the congregation with which I have been associated for the last 38 years – the more so since it was a generous gesture of Holy Blossom two years ago to give this award my name.

Mustard is a star whose ideals and labor have brightened society's darkest skies.

The Jew in the Lotus

The credit for this column goes to the members of my chavurah who chose Rodger Kamenetz's The Jew in the Lotus as our fall topic, and to my husband for the insights which he has offered.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

The impetus for the book, subtitled "A poet's rediscovery of Jewish identity in Buddhist India," was an invitation to have a group representing the Jewish community meet with the Dalai Lama, who had expressed a desire to discover what mechanisms the Jewish people have developed over the centuries to cope with periods of exile. How had a people bereft of ritual place (the Temple) and geographic centre (the land of Israel) managed to retain and develop their religion and sense of identity?

For the Jewish participants, the question was different: Why have many Jews become practising Buddhists in the last quarter-century? Indeed, Halifax has a major centre of Buddhist thought, and as many as 300 JUBUs (Jewish Buddhists) live there with their spiritual guide. So the question of how Jews sustain their identity is no idle one – many have subsumed that identity or abandoned it altogether as they became immersed in Buddhism. The meeting of Jews with the Dalai Lama was fraught with potential antagonism.

I was immediately struck by the dissonance that erupted among members of the Jewish delegation. Representing Judaism is no easy task; no one denomination or movement would be acceptable to the organizers. Therefore the group contained Rabbi Yitz Greenberg and his wife Blu, Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi, Rabbi Joy Levitt, Rabbi Moshe Waldoks, and a number of other participants.

For Rabbi Greenberg, already a controversial figure among his Orthodox brethren, just meeting with the Dalai Lama to discuss religion was a major step. The rabbi and his wife, have been involved in such risky behavior for years. But to meet, and by that meeting validate, a person representing Buddhism was to step into uncharted waters. As a religion which does not recognize a creator, but seeks to return to a state of emptiness, Buddhism would seem to be the complete antithesis of Judaism's overriding monotheism.

Rabbi Schachter-Shalomi, on the other hand, paused to recite Minchah in a Sikh temple. His eagerness to dialogue about the respective mystical traditions of Judaism and Buddhism was manifest from day one. The task of explaining Kabbalah fell to him. And in his explanation, it was clear that his ability to navigate the deep waters of Jewish mysticism opened a door to mutual understanding and learning between Jew and Lama.

For the Greenbergs, the need to remember the historical experiences of the Jews was a key to maintaining Judaism through the centuries. "Always remind" was their mantra, always recall, through ceremony, prayer and study. To pray with another religion is not the Greenberg way; to listen, explain, appreciate the strengths, yes – to participate, no. Thus the tension between the two approaches, one outward and inclusive, one particularistic and introspective.

What did the Dalai Lama learn? The wisdom of Rabbi Greenberg's message, "always remind;" the importance of not only the survival of Tibetan Buddhism, but of the entity called Tibet – the vital need to preserve, in the Dalai Lama's words, "Tibetan Buddhism. For this the land, the physical country of Tibet, is crucial. It is unlikely that [Tibet] can survive as a cultural and spiritual entity if its physical reality is smothered under Chinese occupation." The Dalai Lama, observes Kamenetz, has become a "dharma Zionist."

And what did the Jews learn? To support Tibetan freedom (supporters including the Greenbergs); to become more aware of the potential meditative practice within Judaism, including a way for those seeking meditative Judaism to discover the intense spiritual exercise they crave.

Why have so many Jews abandoned Jewish ways for Buddhism? All of us, Orthodox, Conservative and Reform, have been so focused on the experiential that we have lost the ability to explore the spiritual. We are so busy having experiences – Israel Experience, social action, organizational achievement, correct halachic observance – that we have forgotten the possibilities within Judaism for spiritual contact with an Other. Just recently we chanted the Hoshanahs on Sukkot. What else was that but a meditation and mantra on the abundance of God in relation to humankind? Yet how many of us recognized it?

Shlomo Carlebach taught, "Ever since the Holocaust we are all like priests who have become contaminated by death. It's hard for people who are looking for a loving living God to find him among the angry voices. They go to people who don't have any anger about God."

We have erected too many barriers to encountering the depths of Judaism, the hard places where we contact the divine in all its terrible glory. We need to be less experience-oriented, less materialistic about our faith, more open to the risks of the mystical.

Sukkot Reminiscences

I have been very fortunate to have spent my last two sabbaticals as a guest of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Those years were rewarding and enriching experiences for me and my family. I am fond of saying that for 6 years I labor at the University of Alberta and, in the seventh year, I rest in Jerusalem.

Bruce Elman in Edmonton

A colleague here once asked me why I always took my sabbaticals in Israel.

I told him that I go to Israel "because of the calendar." He could not understand this response so I explained it to him: when I am in Israel, my personal calendar is always in harmony with the State's calendar. Not so here. In Edmonton, my personal calendar is always at odds with society's calendar. I must constantly make accommodations in order to co-ordinate my calendar with the country's calendar.

Consider some of these examples: in Edmonton, a class missed for a Jewish holiday must be rescheduled; not so in Jerusalem where all Jewish holidays are statutory vacation days. In Edmonton, if someone wants to schedule a luncheon meeting during the intermediate days of Pesach, I must first convince them that we should not go out to a restaurant for lunch. Rather we should have a meal catered in the faculty lounge. Then, while they ready themselves for a meal of lasagna or sandwiches, I unpack my hard boiled egg, matzah, and sponge cake. In Jerusalem, there are numerous restaurants which are "kosher for Passover."

Or how about this illustration: every year, in December, we are inundated by "Christmas shows" on television, "Christmas decorations" in the malls, "Christmas parties" at the office. Not so in Jerusalem, where you would be hard-pressed to even know that there was such a holiday.

I must confess that there is a downside to having your personal calendar in sync with society's. For example, in Jerusalem, in the days leading up to Passover, many people decide to have their cars cleaned inside and out in order to ensure that they are "chametz-free". Line-ups at the carwash grow longer, the waiting time increases, and everyone gets a bit edgier because, after all, they have to go home and prepare for the Seder. In Edmonton, on the other hand, there is no pre-Pesach rush at the carwashes.

This feeling that the rhythm of my personal life is out of step with the rhythm of society is at its height during Sukkot. At no time do I long to be in Israel more than during Sukkot. There is no better time to be in Jerusalem. Of all of our memories of those years in Jerusalem, our strongest recollections are of Sukkot.

Now that I think about it, the similarities between Sukkot in Jerusalem and Christmas in Edmonton are astounding – not in theology and conception, of course, but in mood and activity.

In Edmonton, our Christian friends delight in going with their family to pick out a tree. Prior to Sukkot, our whole family walked to Mea Shearim to pick out a lulav and etrog.

The scene was incredible. The whole street was packed with merchants hawking their wares. One fellow was selling etrogim, another lulavim, others hadasim or decorations or carrying cases. All price ranges were available (like Christmas trees I assume).

An etrog, unboxed, unlabelled, and unsigned – the kind we purchased – sold for 10 shekels. Other "models" sold for 25 shekels or 50 or more, depending upon the stature of the Rebbe whose autograph appeared on the box – sort of like designer etrogim.

As Erev Sukkot neared (like Christmas Eve), the 25 and 50 shekel etrogim were taken from their boxes and thrown in the 10 shekel bin. (I assume that this is similar to price reductions on decorations as the stores are closing on Christmas Eve.)

The Christmas custom of decorating the tree is paralleled by the decorating of the sukkah. Great effort is expended in decorating the sukkah.

We bought lots of decorations including a giant pomegranate to hang in the middle of the sukkah. Just outside the Co-op Grocery on Rehov Hapalmach, we purchased huge palm branches for the top of our sukkah. Then we had to put them on the roof of our Fiat Regatta and drive home very slowly so as not to lose them. It was quite a sight!

People go for walks around the neighborhood to view all the decorations. Even the restaurants in Jerusalem set up Sukkot for their customers to eat in if they desire.

School children have 10 days of vacation at Sukkot – just like at Christmas and many families travel during the break.

Well, enough of these reminiscences. I have to go put a heater in my sukkah and brush the snow off the roof.

Do you see what I mean about the calendar?

Mea Shearim, the haredi neighborhood in Jerusalem, is hermetically sealed from outside influences, at least religiously and spiritually. In Kadosh, Amos Gitai parts the veil and reveals a glimpse – nothing more is possible – of this cloistered world.

He does so by examining the lives of two temperamentally different sisters, Rivka and Malka. A conformist, Rivka accepts her society's norms. A rebel, Malka does not.

After 10 years of marriage, Rivka (Yael Abecassis) has still not borne Meir (Yoram Hattab), her scholarly husband, a child. Meir loves and respects Rivka. But Meir's rebbe (Yusuf Abu Warda) persuades him to annual his relationship with Rivka and seek a woman who is not barren. The notion of personal satisfaction seems to be a moot point among haredim. What counts is the continuity of their community. It is, therefore, not surprising that, in their eyes, a woman's raison d'être is reproduction. As Meir declares, sterility is a curse.

Malka (Meital Barda), meanwhile, is none too eager to marry Yossef (Uri Ran Klauzner), the rabbinical scholar her parents have chosen. She is still very much attached to her boyfriend, who has left the haredi community. Eventually, she relents and weds Yossef, but not before she bemoans her circumscribed circumstances.

Kadosh, a sensitive film punctuated by long, soulful pauses and characterized by fine acting and attention to detail, is pro-feminist rather than anti-religious. Yet Gitai, whose direction is deft and naturalistic, is clearly not in sympathy with the sexist manner in which haredim appear to relate to women.

Jonathan Sagall's Urban Feel, which is hip and cynical, distills the essence of a troubled marriage in modern-day Israel.

Emanuel (Sagall), fresh from an extended trip to India, where he apparently subsisted on meditation and herbal tea, looks up an old flame, Eva (Dafna Rechter). She happens to be married to his best friend, Robby (Scharonn Alexander). Conniving his way into her house while Robby is away at work, Emanuel quickly realizes that Eva, the mother of a school boy, is less than happy with her dull husband. Robby's penchant for answering personal ads only exacerbates matters.

Cool, detached and prone to drinking and instant gratification, the bisexual, seemingly nihilistic Emanuel has a torrid affair with Eva, his "partner in despair." But in surrendering to passion, Eva sets the stage for self-liberation and, perhaps, regeneration. As for Emanuel, he is hopelessly adrift.

Suffused with the philosophy that life is extremely ambivalent and unpredictable, Urban Feel is morose without being too pessimistic.

Yana's Friends, a gentle romantic comedy directed by Arik Kaplun, unfolds against the backdrop of the 1991 Gulf War, during which Saddam Hussein's Scud missiles randomly crashed into Tel Aviv. As the sirens wail, a group of newly arrived Russian immigrants try to adjust to the situation as well as to their new surroundings.

The focus is on Yana (Evelyne Kaplun) and Fima (Israel Demidov), a young childless couple hard-pressed to make ends meet. Fima returns to Moscow, leaving Evelyne pregnant and in debt. She, in turn, takes up with Eli (Nir Levi), an easy-going photographer and voyeur. As their story unfolds, the film zeroes in on two other struggling Russian couples and a gruff landlady of Russian origin who makes a startling discovery.

Adolf Eichmann

Open and unaffected, and propelled forward by competent performances, Yana's Friends quietly explores the trials and tribulations Russian olim experience in contemporary Israel.

In the annals of courtroom dramas, the Adolf Eichmann trial in Jerusalem must surely rank as among the most compelling. Eichmann, the Nazi functionary responsible for the deportation of Jews to concentration camps, was abducted by Mossad agents in Argentina in 1960 and brought to Israel to face justice. Convicted of war crimes, he was hanged in 1961, his ashes scattered in the Mediterranean Sea.

Unbeknown to Israelis, the trial was filmed in its entirety. The Specialist, a taut documentary by Eyal Sivan and Rony Brauman inspired by Hannah Arendt's book, Eichmann in Jerusalem, is a cinematic record of part of the proceedings, a chilling portrait of a bland, obedient bureaucrat who finally admitted that he was guilty of "one of the greatest crimes" in history.

As The Specialist begins, Gideon Hausner, the prosecutor, describes the accused as "a beast in the jungle" who no longer deserves to be called a human being. While Hausner speaks, Eichmann, animated by a snicker, polishes his glasses, holding them up to the light, and purses his lips. Later, he writes furiously on a legal pad and plays with his pen as a parade of witnesses implicate him. Occasionally, one of the judges asks for silence when an embittered Holocaust survivor abruptly interrupts the trial.

Invariably calm and collected, Eichmann is partial to metaphors. He likens himself to a "drop in the ocean," a "powerless soldier," a "transmitting agency" and "an instrument in the hands of superior powers" who unwillingly obeyed orders. Hausner is not impressed. "You poor man!" he blurts out, barely containing his rage.

Claiming that he was split between conscience and duty, Eichmann discloses that he requested a transfer, but was refused. He could not shirk orders, nor be released from his oath, he says, describing the Nazis' genocidal crimes as "a monstrous act." Yet Eichmann does not repent. Remorse, he observes dryly, is for little children. The words of an arch criminal, as caught by The Specialist, a movie of immense power.

A commanding, often touching coming-of-age film set in Quebec in 1963, Lea Pool's Emporte-moi (Set Me Free) is somewhat autobiographical. It's a portrait of Hanna, a displaced 13-year-old girl whose father is a Polish Jewish immigrant poet (Miki Manojiovic) and whose mother is a French-Canadian garment factory worker (Pascale Bussieres).

Two pivotal scenes highlight her conflicted identity. In a classroom, Hanna (Karine Vanasse, in a radiant performance) patiently explains why she is neither Catholic nor Jewish. During a class break, she confronts a girl who has just referred to her in racially disparaging terms. In both instances, Hanna acquits herself with self-confidence and poise.

Inspired by the actress Anna Karina in Jean-Luc Godard's Vivre sa vie and by her emphatic teacher (Nancy Huston), Hanna gradually finds herself during the course of an eventful year. And while Emporte-moi is full of telling shots, the most beautiful one of all is one in which mother and daughter connect emotionally on a skating rink. Emporte-moi, in short, is a film of great tenderness and empathy.

Y2K and Israel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our look at the computer millennium bug from a Jewish perspective. Today, Y2K and Israel.

As the world gears up for potential problems brought on by the year 2000 computer bug, an international research group has ranked Israel very high in its readiness. Israel ranked fifth among the countries most prepared (behind the United States, Canada, Australia and South Africa, and ahead of Europe and the Far East) [http://www.globes.co.il/cgi-bin/Serve_Archive_Arena/pages/English/1.2.1.7/19981102/1]. According to the report, Israel is expected to encounter isolated glitches in power supply, telephone communications, banking activity and gas supply, and a shortage of food and water.

Last month the U.S. State Department came to similar conclusions [http://www.israelwire.com/New/990917/9909178.html].

Two weeks ago, a senior invesigator from the FBI warned that Israel and India might take advantage of Y2K confusion to implant harmful code into American computers [http://news.excite.com/news/r/991001/02/tech-yk-code]

Unfortunately, preparations in Israel haven't been perfect. Earlier this year, when Israel's income tax collectors tried to bug-proof their computer, they actually caused thousands of taxpayers to overpay [http://www.usatoday.com/life/cyber/tech/cte600.htm]. (The money was refunded.)

The Israeli government maintains a large Y2K preparedness site with its own countdown clock [http://www.mof.gov.il/2000/]. Please note that this impressive site is almost entirely in Hebrew.

To play it safe, Clalit, Israel's largest health maintenance organization has ordered its physicians not to schedule any elective surgical procedures between Dec. 25 and Jan. 4 [http://www.israelwire.com/New/990602/9906027. html]. In addition to possible technical failures, the organization is also wary of individuals who may take advantage of problems to launch lawsuits.

The Israel Defence Forces have been in high gear since 1996 trying to pinpoint potential problems [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/17.Jan.1999/News/Article-9.html].

According to the IDF's head of computerization, "I promise we are doing our utmost to be 100 percent ready. The trend is to minimize the problem. I can only guarantee…100 percent effort, not 100 percent success."

Since the new millennium will be ushered in on Shabbat, a special ministerial committee has been established to investigate the Y2K issue and its impact on Jewish law [http://www.israelwire.com/new/990729/9907298.html]. The possibility of equipment failure associated with the new century may require that special provisions be made to enable persons to violate the Shabbat or be prepared to do so, should life-threatening situations arise.

On that Shabbat night, hotels in Israel will not be permitted to violate the day by holding New Year's Eve parties [http://www.usatoday.com/life/travel/leisure/t0817jr.htm]. Although hotels will be allowed to hold low-key dinners, they will risk losing their kosher licenses if they permit music and dancing or put on boisterous bashes [http://www.everything2000.com/news/events/sabbath.asp].

Israel is preparing for a tourism boom of Christian pilgrims ushering in the year 2000, with the number of visitors expected to doubling to nearly four million. According to tourism official Amnon Lipzin, "it's tricky for a Jewish state to plan events for a Christian phenomenon, but we know people will always want to have a good time." [http://www.usatoday.com/life/travel/leisure/1999/t0402is.htm]

In addition to the welcome tourists, Y2K hysteria has also been a source of concern in Israel. Earlier this year, Israel deported from the country a group of so-called "Concerned Christians" [http://cnn.com/US/9901/09/israel.group.01/index.html]. Israeli police said members of the Colorado sect had planned to do violence before the millennium in Jerusalem [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/21.Oct.1998/News/Article-9.html].

While many people predict serious problems as we approach the year 2000, David Weinberger likes to find a silver lining in this calendar confusion [http://www.hyperorg.com/backissues/johooct897.html]. Jews have just ushered in the year 5760. That means only 240 years before we face "the Y6K problem! It's not too early to begin raking in the consulting fees."

Jewish Life

Looking back with grace

Another Life, A Memoir Of Other People*, by Michael Korda (Random House, $36.95).

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1957, the New York publishing scene and Michael Korda seemed ideally matched. He was a graduate of Oxford, fluent in four languages and a keen student of modern literature. Moreover, as the son of a celebrated art director and the nephew of a famous film producer, he was acquainted with a clutch of actors and writers. The book business offered a career of intellectual ferment and cultural stimulation. It seemed attractive and promising.

He had little idea of what he was getting himself into. Publishing, in a relatively brief period of time, underwent dramatic and unforeseen changes. It was no longer a "gentleman's profession" but a gigantic international enterprise involving unnerving competition, stunning mergers, spirited auctions and unorthodox methods of book distribution and advertising.

Now, as power editor in charge of Simon and Schuster, Korda looks back with grace and humor on 40 years with the firm, his involvement with the eccentric founding fathers, Richard Simon and Max Schuster, and his gradual but inexorable rise in the hierarchy.

He points out that until the 1920s, book publishing in America was dominated by old, respectable houses that, for the most part, didn't hire Jews – certainly not at an executive level – and published Jewish writers only.

A half-Jew, he was totally unaware of anti-Semitism in the United States which, he writes, "was far more widespread and more socially acceptable in the 1940s and 1950s."

In 1942, his father flew over from England and booked a suite with him at a luxurious hotel in Palm Beach, Fla. The manager showed them around and added, "I need hardly say that you'll be among your own. The hotel is restricted, naturally... I am not supposed to say this, but we don't take people of Jewish faith."

"I have seldom seen my father angrier or move faster. Within an hour, we were in Miami, but the incident had soured him on Florida. After only one night there, we went back to New York, despite the sun and fresh food, both of which my father craved after two years in wartime."

What most readers will relish is the book's delicious gossip. Korda, an excellent raconteur, has a wealth of anecdotes to relate about such writers and celebrities as Irving Wallace, Harold Robbins, S.J. Perelman, Walt Durant, Tennessee Williams, Carlos Castaneda, Graham Greene, Ronald Reagan, Richard Nixon and Mafia boss Joseph Bonano.

One night Korda was awakened by a frantic call from Joan Crawford whose autobiography he had published. She complained bitterly about the white flowers that had been placed in her hotel room.

"Years later," writes Korda, "I happened to mention Joan's horror of white flowers to my Aunti Merle." She nodded, as if it made perfect sense. "In Hollywood, white flowers are for funerals," she said crisply. "Joan knew that better than anyone."

Graham Greene insisted on his chosen title for his book Travels With My Aunt. When his publisher suggested a number of alternatives, Graham wired from Paris "Easier to change publisher than title. Graham Greene."

Ronald Reagan told wonderful stories that weren't true, but that he believed with complete sincerity himself. "Thus we had to argue Reagan with considerable embarrassment out of a story about his being the first soldier to enter the German death camps and record the atrocities there. It turned out that he had never left the United States during World War II. He had seen some of the footage taken at death camps and had somehow convinced himself that he had been there."

Although somewhat carelessly written – repetitive and not free of clichés – this is a deft, lively, engaging and informative autobiography, full of energy, wit and canny reminiscence.

Digging for 'treasure'

By MICHAEL NOBLE
Special to The CJN

It is 4:20 a.m. and I am awake. Thanks to the banging and yelling at our dorm room door, my three roommates and I are getting ready to start another day of midsummer digging at Yavneh Yam, the beachside excavation run by Prof. Moshe Fischer and Tel Aviv University (TAU).

We moan and move slowly, but eventually make our way from bed to bus to site, where we settle with each of our groups into our own loci (dirt holes).

From the dark chill of 5 a.m. until the blazing heat of noon, we brush, scrape or sometimes smash our way down through the layers of history of the ancient biblical port.

We return to the youth village and take a well-deserved nap before we wash and categorize our finds for the day; later we attend a lecture about the site, or about archeology in general. Mixed in somewhere is some free time and eating of much cottage cheese, tomatoes and cucumbers.

The dig is educational, not only because of the lectures, but also because of the day to day mechanics of the dig, like brushing rocks and raising nets for shade. Everything is new and interesting to a guy whose only experience of archeology has been in Indiana Jones movies. Imagine my disappointment when I don't get to use my whip once!

I meet lots of different people and we talk a lot. The dig draws volunteers from ages 15 to 60, Jews and non, from across Europe, Israel and the United States. I am one of only two Canadians. Our multinational panel discusses everything from the Israel peace process to Americanization to Buffy the Vampire Slayer.

We work by the sea. As I dump buckets of dirt down the hill and wipe away my sweat with the bottom of a sandy T-shirt on its third straight day of use (a new shirt will be disgusting in an hour anyway), something about the water calls to me. Perhaps it is the cool rushing waves, perhaps it is the girls in bikinis. I can't be sure.

We spend most of our time moving earth with small tools, and there is a certain back-to-the-sandbox, childlike pleasure in sifting through the dirt, although I'd recommend fellow six-footers to cut their legs off before crouching in a hole for eight hours.

The greatest fun, however, comes when the area supervisor says, "OK clear out those rocks," and we get to stand up, wield the pickaxe and smash our way down to the next layer, with much sweating and grunting.

We find buried treasure. While much of the pottery we find looks as if it could have come from the flowerpot on your window-sill, people also find coins, statuettes and inscriptions, including one in Hebrew.

Archeology, we are told by our TAU leaders, is about careful study and thorough research, but it's always fun to find treasure. I find an unbroken Greek oil lamp from over 2,000 years ago. The lamp is genie-free, but still good enough for a picture and a pat on the back.

It's not the Ark of the Covenant but it's not bad.

Bialik acquires new land to double school space

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hundreds of students, alumni, parents, staff and friends of Bialik Hebrew Day School gathered recently to celebrate the school's acquisition of new land.

The school, located at the corner of Viewmount Avenue and Bathurst Street for all of its 39 years, started out with 50 students in the office space of the Labor Zionist Movement of Canada, the organization that founded the school.

There are now more than 800 students and 90 staff members. Bialik has purchased the land next door, previously rented to several supermarkets. This will almost double the school's space.

Dr. Uri Korin, school principal, says Bialik has always suffered from a shortage of space, and in the past, has expanded by purchasing houses on the same block as the school. "Until now, however, we have never had the ability to expand in a planned session. We have plans now to provide services in the short and long range."

In the short term, he says, the extension will be used as a gym and assembly hall, and to provide drive-through and parking for teachers and guests. "Parking has always been a major issue for the school, parents and neighbors; this will bring great relief.

"In our current [space] situation, we have always had to find creative ways to use the facilities. Now, students will be able to perform and rehearse without disturbing others."

Plans are already in place, he says, and renovations will begin as soon as possible.

The school has begun a "process of consultation to decide how to best plan the whole campus, and integrate the new area in a way that will provide the best educational facilities," Korin says.

The level of excitement among parents, staff and board members about the extension "is second to none. It allows us to plan a facility, rather than patching things up as it is needed," he says.

Although the school's new building will stay as is for now, there are plans for fund raising, "in order to make our vision a reality. We are looking for support from the community at large," Korin says.

At the celebration, speeches were made by Mark Skapinker, president of the board of directors; Lou Kirshenbaum and Pearl Mekler, veteran members of the Labor Zionist movement and school supporters; Nicole Shomair, chair of the student council; and Korin. Sandra Brown, past-president of UJA Federation, brought greetings from the organization.

Some of the youngest students of Bialik Hebrew Day School and representatives of the Labor Zionist Movement of Canada unveil the sign announcing the expansion of the school.

To the many dear friends who conveyed their good wishes during my recent illness,
I would like to express my deep appreciation and gratitude.

Straight From The Top ...

INVEST IN ISRAEL'S SUCCESS

We all have a right to feel proud of Israel's success. Israel's economy is solid. Israel is one of only twenty-three countries rated by the International Monetary Fund as a "developed nation" on par with many western European countries.

WITH ISRAEL BONDS

Every developed nation requires bond financing to support long-term capital projects. Investment funds raised through Israel Bonds help build schools, hospitals, universities, roads and for example, the refitting of Ben-Gurion Airport at a cost of $1.2 billion. These funds are vital for the quality of life for the people of Israel.

COST-EFFECTIVE FOR ISRAEL

Israel Bonds have proven to be a very cost-effective and dependable means of providing Israel with development capital.

Vaughan mayor to be honored at BAYT dinner

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — It is hardly surprising that the first time Lorna Jackson, mayor of Vaughan, is being formally honored, it is by Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation (BAYT).

Just as the synagogue in its 18 years has gone from a basement to a house to its current location on Clark Avenue, so Vaughan, "the city above Toronto," in the 25 years that Jackson has been involved in municipal government, has grown from an area with farms, villages and country roads to a thriving city.

Jackson will receive the BAYT Community Leadership Award at a dinner marking the 18th anniversary of the synagogue on Oct. 25. Also being honored are BAYT's former chairman of the board Larry Zeifman and his wife Sue. Guest speaker will be Dore Gold, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

Jackson met The CJN in her office at Vaughan City Hall at Keele and Major Mackenzie, full of memorabilia from official visitors, an aquarium and her own watercolor paintings.

"Vaughan is unique," she said. "There is so much growth, so much is happening; it is never stagnant."

It wasn't always that way, Jackson remembers. When she and her husband Al moved to Woodbridge, now part of Vaughan along with Maple, Concord and part of Thornhill, the town was "dead. I couldn't even buy a needle and thread there."

Now the area is home to an ever-growing sea of houses, townhouses, apartments and condominiums, with the necessary infrastructure, as well as burgeoning industrial areas.

Included in this growth is a dramatic – and very welcome, according to Jackson – change in the ethnic makeup. From largely "white, Anglo-Saxon Protestant" and Pennsylvania Dutch, Vaughan is now home to Italians, Muslims and Jews, among others. One elementary school she visited had children from 40 countries.

The newcomers were welcomed warmly, Jackson said. "There was a mood of expectation. Everyone wanted the growth that this development would mean."

The municipal government wanted to make everyone comfortable, she said. One of its earliest associations with the Jewish community, for instance, involved lengthening the lights at the busy Bathurst and Clark intersection on Shabbat, and establishing the eruv, which enabled them to carry on Shabbat.

"Joe Tanenbaum and Lou Greenbaum of Runnymede Development were especially helpful in [giving us an] understanding of what was needed," Jackson said.

The same kind of thing happened when the new Muslim community wanted to build a mosque in Maple, she said. "When people complained that its tower would be too high, I told them it would be no higher than the silo on the farm next door. Sometimes it just takes political will."

Lorna Jackson

Jackson grew up in the Dufferin and Eglinton area of Toronto. She joked that she has had a long connection with the name Vaughan – she attended Vaughan Road Public School and Vaughan Road Collegiate, and later moved to Vaughan.

Her first foray into public life was campaigning for mandatory face protectors for young hockey players. She went from there to writing for the Woodbridge News, eventually having her own column, and a weekly show on Classicom, the local cable station.

In 1974, she was elected as a councillor at large. She has been mayor for 17 years.

Until Joyce Frustaglio was elected in a recent election, Jackson was the only woman on council. "At the beginning, there was a lot of resistance. Some of the councillors worried that they wouldn't be able to swear in the back room!"

Nevertheless, thanks in part to her liberal use of common sense, she thinks, she was accepted.

For women, she said, municipal politics is "like looking after a big family. You are close to the people, and can have a real effect on what is going on."

Jackson considers transit to be a major priority. Much has already been done. Highway 407 runs across the top of the city and 427 is being extended north.

What she is pushing for now, she said, is to have the subway extended to York University, with connections right to the 407, and then down Yonge Street.

"When they built the 407, I insisted on a reserved area for LRT [rapid transit]. The whole subway could be above ground, which would save a lot of money."

As well, she said, the hydro corridor along the 407 would provide a large number of parking spaces.

She recognizes that "people don't want to use public transit. Many of the buses we have now are running for only one or two people."

Jackson relaxes, when she can, spending time with her children and grandchildren, and cross country skiing, sailing and snorkelling, but her main hobby is researching and painting local life in the old days. Among her works are paintings of the first Binder Twine Festival in Kleinberg, Woodbridge Roller Mills and the Kleinberg Mill.

Thornhill teen's big mouth sets new grape record

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Michael Levinson never dreamed that a big mouth would one day come in handy.

The 13-year-old's cavernous cheeks and kisser have landed him on network U.S. television and into the Guinness Book of World Records.

Like many kids his age, Levinson, a Grade 8 student at Associated Hebrew Day School's Danilack campus, has been enthralled with the popular TV version of Guinness for as long as it's been on the air. And for the last four years, he's been pumping iron, so to speak, getting in shape for his own unique event: stuffing as many grapes into his mouth as possible without breaking any.

It's not exactly an Olympic event, but it was good enough for Guinness to create a whole new category and an entry into the next edition of its famous record book, scheduled for 2001.

More immediate fame will come Levinson's way when his feat will be broadcast on the Guinness TV program in the coming weeks.

A poised young man, Levinson is aware of the dangers of his specialty. He advises against trying this yourself, having perfected his stuffing and breathing techniques. "It's possible to choke," he says nonchalantly, "if you do it wrong."

It all started innocently enough, back in Grade 4 at Associated's lunch room, where young boys often try doing disgusting things with food. Levinson began filling his mouth with grapes, and a light went off, even though a teacher wanted to know why he was, as he recalls, "eating like a pig."

Last year, he attained a personal best: 66 red, seedless, medium-sized grapes, all intact. But no one was watching.

Over the summer, he videotaped himself packing 43 large grapes into his mouth, and sent the tape to the Guinness show in Hollywood.

The producers called back and within 24 hours, sent a limousine to the Levinsons' Thornhill home, whisking Michael and his parents, Toby and Marty, to the airport, and on to California.

Rehearsals and tapings took place in a three-day whirlwind, with a paramedic and an official from the Guinness book standing by to authenticate the feat.

"The judges were really strict," Michael recalls. "They inspected each grape before and after. The grapes had to be longer than half an inch."

The young man lived up to his billing, stuffing 63 grapes into his maw. But the judges subtracted nine that had been punctured or broken, leaving 54 – and a new world record, to be published for posterity.

Michael shrugs. "It was pretty cool."

How does his mother feel?

"I'm not proud of it," admits Toby, who works for Jewish Family & Child Service. "There's nothing to be proud of.

"But I am proud that he got into the book, and that he pursued his dream."

Michael prefers red grapes to green ones because he says their skin is tougher and less likely to break. He begins by packing his cheeks and then his mouth, careful not to completely block his airway.

Like all Guinness "athletes," he'll be trying to break his own record over the months, hoping that natural growth will enlarge his prize mouth.

Agunot organization to say prayers in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In its first major event of the new year, L'mann Yisrael International, an organization dedicated to helping the plight of agunot, will say prayers at Rachel's Tomb in Israel on 11 Cheshvan, the anniversary of Rachel's death. It falls on Oct. 21 this year.

Mattie Klein, founder and president of the the New York-based organization, will read out the names of agunot and former agunot at the tomb. She is asking people wanting their names read to contact her at 1-718-338-0833.

"Mobs of people, especially women, pray at Rachel's grave on the anniversary of her death. We are hoping that God will hear the tears and prayers of these women who cannot get married and cannot have children," Klein said in a telephone interview from New York.

She said Oct. 21 is also dedicated as a worldwide tfillah day, and Jews are urged to repeat the prayer written by Rabbi Mordechai Tendler – it can be found in the Sept. 2 edition of The CJN – and Psalms 120 to 131.

It's apple and pear season

Apples and pears are now at the peak of their season. These recipes, courtesy of Foodland Ontario, give some ideas on how to incorporate the fruits into your party or everyday menus.

APPLE BEEF STIR-FRY

¾ lbs. beef, cut in thin strips
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
6 medium mushrooms, sliced
2 onions, halved and sliced
1 stalk celery, sliced
1 small green, red or yellow pepper, cut in thin strips
1 clove garlic, chopped
2 cups spinach leaves, in bite-size pieces
3 McIntosh apples, cored and sliced
Marinade:
½ cup beef stock
1 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. each soy sauce and cornstarch dried basil salt
pepper

Combine marinade ingredients in small bowl; add beef strips and set aside.

Heat 1 tbsp. oil in wok or large skillet, over medium-high heat. Add mushrooms, onions, celery and green pepper; stir-fry for 5 minutes. Add garlic and stir-fry 2 minutes until all vegetables are softened. Remove vegetables from wok; keep warm. Add remaining 1 tablespoon oil to wok and heat. Using slotted spoon, remove beef strips from marinade, reserving marinade. Stir-fry beef strips 5 minutes or until beef is just rare. Return vegetables to wok and stir-fry all together for 2 minutes. Add spinach, apples and remaining marinade; stir-fry 1 to 2 minutes until well combined and sauce is thickened. Serves 4.

ROLLED APPLE-STUFFED TURKEY BREAST

5 lbs. boneless turkey breast, skinned pinch each salt and pepper
¾ cup apple juice or apple cider
2 tbsp. dry white wine
1 tbsp. curry powder
1 small onion, minced
1 stalk celery, chopped
1 tbsp. pareve margarine
2 McIntosh apples, peeled and diced
2 slices whole wheat bread, crumbled
½ tsp. poultry seasoning
Sauce:
1 cup chicken broth
1 tbsp. cornstarch
1 tsp. ground ginger
Garnish:
spinach leaves
unpeeled McIntosh apple slices

Trim fat from turkey and discard. Flatten with meat mallet to an even thickness. Sprinkle with salt and pepper.

Combine apple juice, wine and curry powder. Reserve ½ cup to use for making sauce.

In skillet, saute onion and celery in margarine 5 minutes or until softened. Stir in ¼ cup apple juice mixture, apple, bread crumbs and poultry seasoning. Spread down centre of turkey breast to within 2-inches of sides. Roll up, jelly-roll fashion, starting with short side. Tie at 2-inch intervals with heavy string. Place seam side down on rack in shallow roasting pan. Brush with 2 tablespoons apple juice mixture. Roast, basting occasionally, in 325 oven 1½ hours or until meat thermometer registers 185. Serves 8.
Sauce:

In saucepan, combine reserved apple juice mixture, chicken broth, cornstarch and ginger; bring to boil. Reduce heat and cook, stirring constantly, until thickened and smooth. Line platter with spinach. Place turkey on spinach; remove string. Let stand 10 minutes before slicing. Garnish with apple slices. Serve sauce over turkey slices.

PARSNIPS WITH PEARS AND WILD RICE

2 lbs. parsnips, peeled and cut in chunks
¼ cup milk
1 tbsp. butter
salt and pepper to taste
1 cup cooked wild rice
2 cups thinly sliced pears
2 tbsp. packed brown sugar
¼ tsp. nutmeg
Topping:
½ cup dry bread crumbs
2 tbsp. packed brown sugar
2 tbsp. butter, melted
1 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley

In saucepan of boiling water, cook parsnips until tender; drain. Mash with milk, butter and salt and pepper to taste. Mix in wild rice. Spread half evenly in greased 8 cup casserole.

Toss pears with sugar and nutmeg; arrange on top. Cover with remaining parsnips mixture. (Casserole can be prepared to this point, covered and refrigerated overnight. Remove to room temperature 30 minutes before baking.)
Topping:

Combine bread crumbs, brown sugar and butter. Mix in parsley; sprinkle over casserole. Bake in 350 oven 35 to 40 minutes or until pears are fork-tender and parsnips heated through. Serves 8.

APPLES 'N' SWEET POTATOES WITH MAPLE GLAZE

2 or 3 sweet potatoes, about 2 lbs.
4 apples
2 tbsp. butter
Generous pinches each cinnamon and nutmeg
¼ cup maple syrup
pinch salt

Peel potatoes and cut into 1 inch, thick slices; cut into halves or quarters to form bite-size pieces. In saucepan, cook in boiling, lightly salted water 8 to 10 minutes or until tender. Drain well and set aside. Meanwhile, peel, core and cut apples into 2 inch cubes; set aside.

In large frying pan, melt 1 tbsp. of the butter. Add apples and sprinkle with cinnamon and nutmeg; cook, stirring often, over medium heat until apples are just tender, about 5 minutes.

Stir in remaining butter. Add maple syrup and potatoes; sprinkle with salt. Stir gently over medium heat until most of the maple syrup is absorbed. Serves 4 to 6.

APPLE-PEAR BUTTERMILK CAKE WITH MAPLE SYRUP GLAZE

1½ cups all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. ground nutmeg
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
⅓ cup unsalted butter, at room temperature
⅔ cup granulated sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
⅔ cup buttermilk
2 small apples (unpeeled), thinly sliced
1 small pears (unpeeled), thinly sliced
Glaze:
½ cup maple syrup
1 tbsp. cornstarch

Lightly oil or butter 9½-inch springform pan. In bowl, stir together flour, baking powder, baking soda, nutmeg, cinnamon and salt until evenly blended.

In mixing bowl and using electric mixer, beat butter on medium speed 30 seconds. Add sugar and beat 2 minutes. Add eggs and beat until light and fluffy. Beat in vanilla.

With mixer on low speed, alternately beat in flour mixture and buttermilk, making 3 additions of dry and 2 of liquid, to make thick batter. Turn into prepared pan and smooth top. Arrange alternating slices of apple and pear in tight concentric pattern on top, gently pushing out side of fruit into batter. Bake in 350 degree oven 45 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean.

Glaze: Meanwhile, in small saucepan, whisk together maple syrup and cornstarch over medium heat until blended; bring to boil, stirring often. Reduce heat to low and cook, stirring frequently until thickened, about 5 minutes. Brush over hot cake; let cool 5 minutes.

Remove sides of pan. Brush sides of cake with glaze. Gently pour remaining glaze over top. Cut into wedges and serve warm or cool. Cake will keep refrigerated for several days. Serves 6 to 8.

U of Manitoba's JSA rises from the ashes

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three years ago, the University of Manitoba's Jewish Student's Association (JSA) was in dire need of an overhaul.

Programming had dwindled to one or two events per year and there was a drastic reduction in attendance.

But in recent years, interest in the organization has skyrocketed.

This burgeoning interest can be attributed to the efforts of the JSA's former director, Ray Offman, strong student leadership, and an influx of dollars for student activities, said Hal Bordy, executive director of the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre, which supervises, funds and receives grants for Jewish campus programs in Winnipeg.

Bordy, who has served as executive director for 1½ years, told The CJN in a recent telephone interview that community members have noticed a renaissance in both the University of Winnipeg (U of W) and the University of Manitoba's (U of M) Jewish student associations.

"They're so impressed by seeing the amount of activity and the prominence of the student associations on campus. It's a dramatic change," he said.

In response to the group's rejuvenation, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba has agreed to grant the U of M's JSA money to refurbish its student lounge which hasn't been renovated since the '70s, Bordy said.

"From what I heard from the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council and staff in the [Rady Jewish Community] centre, it [the JSA] was very weak, very quiet for a few years...and then it kind of took off," Bordy said.

The JSAs of both universities changed their approach to membership, which may explain their increasing popularity, Bordy noted.

The groups have moved away from the membership requirement and opened events to everyone, said Aaron Katchen, director of the JSA of both the U of M and U of W, since August.

"Every Jewish student is a member as opposed to whoever fills out a membership card or pays the fee," Katchen said.

Bordy is convinced that strong student leadership has been instrumental in the groups' resurgence.

"If you can attract student leaders who are mainstream, typical university students who have charisma and will have a following, that helps, and we've had that the last couple of years," he said.

He cited Mathew Lobb as an example of a student leader who has helped facilitate the JSA's growth.

President of the JSA, Lobb, a third-year psychology student at the U of M, was the only Canadian this year to win an Exemplar of Excellence award from Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life. He won for his contribution to the campus community.

The six other Exemplar of Excellence award winners were from American and Russian universities.

Bordy nominated Lobb for the Hillel award in June.

"His enthusiasm and charisma are his greatest strength. He's the ideal leader because he's visible [on campus]," said Bordy.

Lobb loves organizing Jewish campus events.

"When people are having a good time and they can't wait for the next program, it makes it all worth it," he said.

But Lobb stressed that he is not the only student leader responsible for the JSA's success.

"We have an excellent executive board that's very dedicated and they care a lot about the JSA," he said.

Lobb also works closely with the U of W's JSA president Anna Tennenhouse in planning joint events, he said.

"She is an exceptional leader. She works very hard."

He said one of the JSA's biggest challenges is meeting the needs of students with varying interests; he and other JSA executives have tried to expand and diversify the variety of programs the group offers.

For example, the executive members discovered that some students wanted outdoor programs, so they are planning to have a canoe trip and hike.

Last November, the JSAs of both Manitoba universities held a Shabbaton and about 60 people attended, Lobb said.

At the Hillel leaders convention he attended in August where he received his award, Lobb said he and his executive heard some good programming ideas from their American counterparts.

He said students from the University of Maryland presented a program called Mitzvah Day, which had been successful on their campus; the program entailed a day of charity work with a reception afterwards and Lobb hopes to try this out at the U of M.

Branksome students well-prepared for challenges of University

As each member of the Branksome Hall Class of 1999 went off to university last month, she took with her the solid academic foundation provided by the demanding university-preparatory curriculum she received at Branksome.

The Branksome faculty instills a love of learning that motivates students to succeed and inspires them to distinguish themselves. During the past academic year, Banksome students placed in the top 10% of all students who applied to Engineering programs at University of Toronto; scored in the top 0.5% among all Canadian students in math contests; were invited to compete in the Canadian Math Olympiad; received multiple scholarships; and were invited to attend universities such as Harvard, Yale, Princeton and University of Pennsylvania in the United States, and Canadian universities including Queen's, University of Toronto, University of Western Ontario, University of British Columbia, University of Waterloo and Mt. Allison University.

Not just the graduating year students benefit from Branksome's high standards. All 850 girls from Junior Kindergarten learn and explore in a nurturing environment which combines the highest quality academic, athletic and co-curricular programs. Branksome students are also taught the importance of community involvement-through our community service program.

Applications are now being accepted for the 2000/2001 academic year. For more information on tours, interviews and financial aid, please contact the Admissions Office at (416) 920-6265 ext. 268.

MEPHISTO®

For outstanding quality, unparalleled comfort and a superb fit, it's MEPHISTO'S Autumn / Winter '99 collection.

SLACKER: All SLACKER shoes feature the built-in AIR-BAG cushioned, shock-absorbing heel. Irresistible design features and exceptional fit make them trendsetters in walking comfort.

GOODYEAR WELT: These shoes are characterized by remarkable, high quality shoemaking, ideal for those who understand the importance of fine details. The original GOODYEAR double-stitching and foam latex insoles assure outstanding performance, durability and comfort.

TRAMPOLINS: The most successful walking shoes in all of Europe, featuring the softest cushioning with latex midsoles, AIR-BAG shock absorbers, non-slip Multigrip soles and all-round soft padding for the ultimate in walking comfort.

These shoes, for men and women, are handcrafted of the finest genuine leathers, natural latex and rubber, with an anatomically-shaped insole for perfect arch support. Generous padding allows for easy walking without chafing or pressure.

AIR-JET & COOL-AIR: The ultimate in style and function for both city and country conditions. These lightweight shoes, for men and women, offer built-in comfort and air-circulation features.

SHERPAS: The strength of these shoes matches the power of nature, unparalleled for adventure and freedom. Feel the magic of Mephisto under your feet in these classic styles.

Many new styles come equipped with this innovative shock absorption system. The unique technology efficiently reduces the strain on muscles and bones caused by walking.

MEPHISTO AIR-BAGS are created from air-cushions of elastic and transparent natural rubber. Placed under the heel, they serve as shock absorbers, eliminating the uncomfortable stress of impact.

Mephisto: investment in healthy feet pays major dividends

When you get up in the morning, the first thing you do is put your feet on the floor; and you'll be on them all day. They deserve respect!

By your mid-40s, you'll have walked over 100,000 miles. That's right — over one hundred thousand miles! Understandably, it's at this age that foot problems often begin to surface. The well-being of your feet is integral to the overall health of your body; so if you wish to continue enjoying walking and the benefits of body support, posture and circulation that come from healthy feet, you'll begin to view footwear not as an expense but as an investment.

If you're thinking along these lines, try on a pair of Mephisto shoes. The Antares Slacker and Boomerang Trampolins are typical of Mephisto's quality construction and comfort. First, they're made from the finest leathers and other natural materials. Second, they offer total foot comfort through a myriad of design features. Among others, these include air-cushioned latex foam midsole; orthopedic foot-bed; heel cushioning for protection of joints; padded tongue; genuine leather inner sole; padded topline; protective mudguard and cleated sole for maximum grip; and, in the Boomerang, year-round weather protection with Gore-Tex lining that keeps your feet warm, dry and waterproof, yet lets them breathe. In fact, Mephisto Gore-Tex footwear is guaranteed waterproof and breathable for one full year! If you require additional information about Mephisto's product line, you can contact Ralph Benisty, Director of Operations for Canada, at (905) 881-0050.

Mephisto shoes are the perfect year-round companion for your feet, and will always go the extra mile — with you and for you.

Cotler nomination meeting marked by protest

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — On the night of his acclamation as Liberal candidate for Mount Royal, Irwin Cotler was introduced to the noisy world of street politics as about 50 demonstrators demanded the federal government spend more money on social housing.

Banging on pots and shouting in French through a megaphone, the demonstrators chanted, "Cotler, Cotler. You defended prisoners. Will you defend the poorly housed?"

The demonstration was organized by the Front d'Action Populaire en Réaménagement Urbain, a housing rights lobby group, and coincided with the International Day for Housing.

The participants called on Cotler, known for his championing of human rights and social justice, to speak out on a recent United Nations report critical of Canada's housing problems. They want Ottawa to put some of the budgetary surplus back into low-cost, non-profit housing.

The demonstration took place, under heavy police security, outside Congregation Beth-El in Town of Mount Royal as the Mount Royal Liberal Association confirmed the candidacy of Cotler, the only nominee by the Oct. 1 deadline. About 500 turned out for the meeting, which featured a speech by Treasury Board president Lucienne Robillard.

The date of the by-election had not been announced, but association president Marc Leiter indicated it may be by the time many have headed south.

When Cotler entered the race, one of his pledges was to "find creative and responsive approaches to the growing gap between rich and poor." He also highlighted his anti-poverty activities some 30 years ago, including founding the Pointe St. Charles legal aid clinic.

Cotler did not meet with the demonstrators, nor did he directly address the issue they raised.

However, he did comment that "globalization has impacted the poor disproportionately, and it is the task of the government to address and redress the growing chasm between rich and poor."

He pointed to the level of child poverty among blacks, in particular, as a "disgrace," citing statistics that 40 percent of the children of this community live in poor families, twice the national average.

Cotler did speak about his values, which include "respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, cultural pluralism and group identity, respect for a wide variety of beliefs, and equal justice."

He said he would work to "broaden and deepen" Canada's foreign policy regarding human rights.

He paid tribute to his parents, Fay and the late Nathan Cotler, as well as his Russian-born grandfather, for instilling in him humanistic ideals.

Cotler said his is a "two-for-one candidacy" – he and his wife, Ariella. Having worked in the office of Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, Ariella is no stranger to politics.

Cotler described former Mount Royal MP Sheila Finestone, who was appointed to the Senate in August, as "an exemplary parliamentarian."

Finestone spoke at the meeting. "We are fortunate to have such a candidate come forward…A proven leader by his actions and words…A household name to those who care deeply about the preservation of democratic society and fundamental human rights," she said.

Cotler also acknowledged the three men who dropped their nomination bids, all present that evening: Saulie Zajdel, Anthony Housefather and David Lisbona.

Mount Royal, once represented by Pierre Trudeau, has been Liberal since its formation 59 years ago, but the party is taking nothing for granted.

Robillard warned that participation in by-elections is traditionally very low. "Usually, citizens think it is not so important. The government is already there. The opposition is there. Why go and vote? We have to convince them it is their duty."

She sprinkled her address with Hebrew, which always delights Jewish audiences.

Leiter added that, "There is no question the size of the majority is critical. Irwin's credibility in caucus will be very much affected."

Leiter announced that the association's membership is now over 3,000, making it the largest political organization in Quebec. Cotler said his team signed up more than 2,000.

CJC region joins protest against 'free speech' meeting

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, joined forces with the B.C. Human Rights Association and other agencies to protest against a "free speech" meeting featuring Doug Collins and Doug Christie Sept. 30 in Vancouver.

Nisson Goldman, vice-chair of CJC, Pacific region and vice-chair of its community relations committee, took part in a news conference preceding the meeting at the Vancouver Public Library's main branch, but didn't join the rowdy group of about 100 people who protested during the evening meeting, he said in a phone interview from Vancouver.

Collins is the former North Shore News columnist who was ordered in February by the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal to pay $2,000 and apologize for a series of articles promoting hatred against Jews.

Doug Christie is Collins' lawyer. He has also represented pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel.

The library meeting, which was not cancelled despite complaints to the library board and to Vancouver mayor Phillip Owen, was organized to raise funds for Collin's upcoming appeal of the tribunal ruling, to take place in the B.C. Supreme Court later this month.

Among those protesting the meeting was B.C. Federation of Labour President Jim Sinclair, who called the event "a threat to library workers and visiting patrons" in a news release last week.

"The Vancouver Public Library ought not to open its doors to groups to use publicly-funded facilities for the pursuit of the agenda which has a reasonable prospect of promoting bigotry," added Goldman. "By doing so, the diverse segments of our community would neither feel comfortable nor safe in the library venue."

The library itself was designed by Haifa-born architect Moshe Safdie and is a "unique and interesting building, a landmark," according to Goldman. "Anything you hold there has a lot of public presence," he told The CJN.

Vancouver has a diverse population, Goldman noted, with sizable Chinese, Sikh and gay/lesbian components. The Jewish population is about 25,000.

But the meeting was not an isolated B.C. incident, he noted. "These people run right across the country."

CJA helps out street kids

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Combined Jewish Appeal has teamed up with Rossbrook House, an inner-city, alternative program for street kids and youth, in a joint fundraising venture.

The Cars for Kids program, which was inaugurated in early September, is aimed at raising money for children's programs at both the 23-year-old Rossbrook House and the Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Bob Freedman, executive director of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, praised Rossbrook House for the "valuable service" it provides to children in the inner city.

"The Combined Jewish Appeal raises money not only for the Jewish community," he noted, "but also for programs in the general community where we can. We are very excited about this partnership."

Sister Bernadette O'Reilly, head of Rossbrook House, echoed Freedman's words. "We are delighted to be invited to be part of this partnership," she said.

Cars for Kids was initiated by the Winnipeg branch of a company called Buck's Auto Parts. The concept is similar to the Kidney Foundation's Cars for Kidneys program.

Based on the appraised value of the car, people will get charitable receipts for donating their old clunkers to the CJA-Rossbrook House fund. Buck's will look after towing the car to its compound and disposing of it.

According to the wishes of the donor, the proceeds from the sale of a car are directed to either the CJA to fund programs for children with special needs or to Rossbrook House.

If the donor has no preference as to where the money goes, the money is to be split between the two organizations.

"We have already had a nice older Caprice donated," said Benjy Katz of Buck's Auto Parts. Buck's is involved in different car donation programs across Canada, Katz reported.

"We have had some dealings with the Jewish community here," Katz said, "and Rossbrook and Sister Bernadette have great reputations in the community. The two organizations made a good fit."

Living with Aging Parents and Dependent Children ~ A Panel Discussion

Sunday, October 17, 1999 at 8:00pm
Refreshments will be served.

Come and hear great insight into the problems and anxiety being faced by those who are, or will soon be, "sandwiched" between the needs of caring for aging parents and their responsibilities to children and grandchildren. Find out what resources are available for assistance. Discuss the social, medical, legal and spiritual approaches and alternatives.

This program may be the first step in creating an ongoing support group.

New religious schools proposed clause.

The task force Proulx headed, during its own hearings in April 1998, rejected the model now being proposed to the government by CJC.

Offering religious groups the right to have their own schools within an otherwise secular public system would be "incompatible" with the goal of "promoting social cohesion by teaching students to live together" and would pose major administrative problems.

The task force also found that the legality of such schools is debatable.

"Parents who want their children to attend schools that reflect their values should look to the private school system, as this is precisely the purpose of the private school system," the report states.

CJC insists that publicly-funded religious schools is "the only way to ensure equitable parental choice...

"Majority interests could still prevail under the single public system proposed by the report. Through the prescribed program on the teaching of religions from a cultural perspective, inequities could continue to create the de facto discrimination that exists under the status quo."

CJC is opposed to the compulsory religions course Proulx recommends, which would have to be taught as well in the Jewish day schools.

"How is one to ensure the equitable and accurate transmission of the values and history of our major religions? We suspect that it would be very difficult to design a curriculum that would not reflect some level of religious or cultural bias."

As for the Jewish schools, CJC notes that their curriculum is already very demanding. About 65 percent of Jewish students attend the day schools, CJC says.

CJC does support the recommendation of extracurricular religious instruction. "This would ensure the promotion of Jewish values for children whose parents did not wish to see them educated in an exclusively Jewish environment."

The CJC brief stresses that the public school system should eliminate "institutionalized discrimination" by ensuring that no religious group is given rights that are not available to others. The use of the notwithstanding clause to maintain the privileges enjoyed by Catholics and Protestants is "an affront" to human rights, according to CJC.

"Parental choice is expressed by the availability of a full range of publicly-funded educational options that recognize legislatively guaranteed rights to religious education... We do not believe that an exclusively secular system should be the only choice open to parents."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

It is now official. After a difficult courtship characterized alternatively by excessive flirtation and coyness, the Reform-Tory shidduch is off.

The Progressive Conservative convention that took place in Toronto two weeks ago provided Tory leader Joe Clark with all the support he needed to permanently rebuff the Reform movement and the United Alternative.

Increasingly, people within the two parties and observers of the political process have accepted the wisdom that a merger on the right can come only after the mechutanim – Joe Clark and Preston Manning – exit. This, however, is not news. In fact, we came to the same conclusion weeks ago in this space.

One individual has tracked these developments with great zeal. One could even say, the fortunes of the United Alternative have changed his life...and perhaps yours as well.

Since early this past summer, Jean Chrétien has been teasing his caucus and the media with hints concerning his future. Over the last six weeks, those hints have shifted into ever more bold assertions that he fully plans to lead the Liberals into the next election. And why not? Now that it is clear that he's unlikely to face any credible opposition from a unified right, the temptation to seek a third majority government must be overwhelming.

The implications for the country are ominous. And, the Jewish community, which has its own agenda that it would like to advance, should be concerned.

Like retailers, politicians pay keenest attention to the demands of their constituents when they know the consumer can shop elsewhere if the price or quality of the merchandise is not right. What incentive exists for the Liberal government to be responsive to Jewish representations on a whole range of issues if it knows that, like other interest groups, Jews have nowhere else to shop their agenda?

It seems, therefore, that the community has two choices. First, it can again assume a more visible and meaningful role within the Liberal party, thereby ensuring that its views can be promoted from within. Or, its members can join in the effort to build a credible alternative to the Liberal government.

Either way, it means engaging in a partnership with others.

Now there's a revolutionary idea...seeking a common cause with others for the benefit of all. Why didn't I think of that?

All Set for Super Sunday

Super Sunday may be coming quickly but it's taken a long time to get there.

A volunteer team of 40 people, led by Judy Engel, Rosanne Ain and Dov Altman, has been working for six months to prepare for UJA Federation's largest one day fund raising event, this coming Sunday, October 17.

Nearly 800 volunteers will be dialing up over 10,000 contributors, from 9:00am to 9:00pm on Super Sunday and for the "Super Week" nights following, to help raise funds for UJA Federation's Campaign 2000.

With only a few days left, preparations for this marathon event, which will take place at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., are in the final stages. Over 150 phones will be used during consecutive three hour shifts and over 1,200 volunteer hours will go into making these telethons, which raised $2.8 million last year, another great success.

"It's truly a monumental effort," says David Engel, who is Co-Chairing UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond. "It's one full day for community members to work together."

Funds raised by Campaign 2000 will be used to assist the vulnerable, rescue Jews from danger and strengthen Jewish identity.

This year, community members who respond to campaigners on the phone by saying "Hi UJA, I'm Answering the Call" and increase their gift, are eligible to be entered into a draw to win a trip for two to Israel.

To become a Super Sunday volunteer, please call (416) 635-2883 ext. 177.

Meet the Market Moguls

Peter Cohen

Mitchell Goldhar

Ed Sonshine

Three of Canada's leading real estate market mavens will be together under one roof to share the secrets of their success - plus a whole lot more.

The Real Estate Challenge: Survival of the Fittest, October 28, 7:30 pm at the Park Hyatt, 4 Avenue Road, will feature Peter Cohen, President & CEO of Centrefund Realty Corporation, Mitchell Goldhar, President and CEO of First Professional Management Inc. and Edward Sonshine, President and CEO of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust.

Goldhar, one of the country's leading retail developers, is best known for his pioneering partnership with Wal-Mart, which will be opening its 50th store in Canada next year.

Cohen's shopping centre investment company, which operates in Canada and the U.S., owns a portfolio of 64 properties containing approximately 9.6 million square feet of space.

Edward Sonshine's RioCan, Canada's largest publicly-traded REIT (Real Estate Investment Trust), owns a portfolio of approximately 125 shopping centres comprising over 17 million square feet of space. Sonshine is also Vice-Chair and Director of Counsel Corporation, one of Canada's largest health-care and business development companies.

"These men are not only movers and shakers in the real estate realm," notes event chair David Peltz, "their diverse backgrounds and tremendous experience make them among the top thinkers in Canadian business."

Tickets for the event ($20 in advance and $25 at the door), can be ordered by calling (416) 635-2883 ext. 177.

Danger Drives Jews From Dagestan

A dangerous situation is brewing in the impoverished republic of Dagestan that is forcing Jews to leave behind 1200 years of history.

Since the beginning of the year, 550 Dagestani Jews have been airlifted by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency out of the country besieged by Islamic rebels fighting for an independent state.

Dagestan's Jewish community, one of the oldest in the former Soviet Union (FSU), traces itself back at least 12 centuries. But since the break-up of the FSU over a decade ago, 25,000 Jews, out of a population of 40,000, have left for Israel as a result of the violent efforts of Muslim militants to spread their fundamentalist ideology throughout the country.

Increasingly Jews are being targeted by random violent attacks, including kidnapping, forcing many to give up their homes and businesses and seek emergency assistance from the Jewish Agency.

"We are not panicking, but the situation is very serious," says a Jewish leader, who did not want to be identified, during a recent phone interview from the Dagestani capital of Makhachkala.

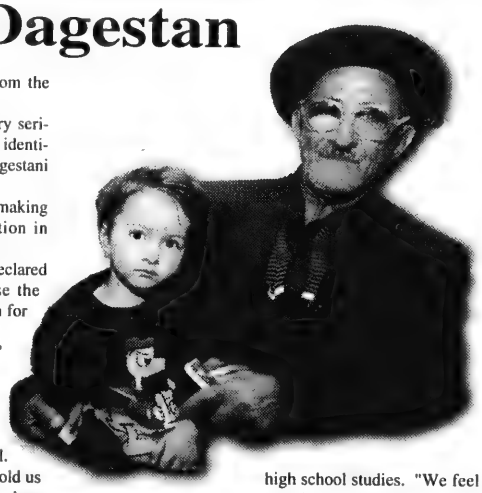
For ten years the Sitkilovs procrastinated about making aliyah – hoping against all hope that the situation in Mahachkalah would get better.

"Crime is on the increase since the Dagestanis declared independence," explains Alex Sitkilov, "because the local militias need money for arms and ammunition for their resistance fight against the Russians."

"Bandits attacked our house late at night," recounts Alex, whose father, Boris, began making plans to leave for Israel the very next day.

In September, the Sitkilovs were among 150 Dagestani Jews flown to Israel by the Jewish Agency. "The Agency officials were very helpful. We needed to sell our house and belongings. They told us to take our time and that they were very flexible about when they could fly us to Israel," adds Boris, 58.

Other Sitkilov children already live in Israel. Paulina, 29, who is married with two children, came to Israel in 1991. Arkady, 21, reached Israel in 1995 on the Jewish Agency's Na'aleh 16 program, through which young people come to Israel without their parents and complete their high school studies. "We feel very much at home already," insists Alex. "I feel I have a great future here."



According to Alla Levy, the Moscow-based director of the Agency's Russia office, emigration to Israel from Dagestan will continue at an average of 150 a month, as a result of the current crisis.

Coast to Coast

CYJ hosts youth conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish youth leaders from Belgium, England, Hungary, Israel, Turkey and Canada came together recently for a six-day conference hosted by Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ) in Toronto.

The sixth annual European and Canadian Seminar highlighted similarities and differences among the two dozen participants from different countries. Issues discussed in seminars included pluralism, the place of a Jewish youth movement in the 21st century and the possibility of joint international projects.

For Jerusalem-based Rebecca Glass, director of the European and Canadian desk for the international movement, the highlight of the meeting here in her hometown was the singing at Friday night dinner. "What united us was the songs," she said.

For David Seal, England's national director, the exchange of ideas made the meeting valuable.

All the countries run programs with a strong Jewish educational component, but "the movement works a little differently in each country," said Glass.

Within CYJ and its affiliated sister movements, certain countries are known for their strengths: Belgium for scouting, Turkey for folkdancing and Canada for its summer camps.

Hungary has the unique distinction of being the newest and oldest affiliate (it was revitalized in recent years after a long dormancy under the Communist regime).

Unlike Canada, which has six summer camps, CYJ's Hungarian counterpart runs camps only in winter and spring, because a Jewish camp already exists.

"Canada is really professional in [terms of] camp," said Dafna Lahav, a shlichah in Belgium. The Canadians can teach the others how to run interesting and unique camp programs, she noted.

In Belgium, the movement serves 500 young people in Antwerp and Brussels. In Antwerp, with its Jewish population of 20,000, the non-religious Young Judaea movement and the B'nei Akiva movement, which is Orthodox, sometimes run joint programs.

In England, unlike Belgium, the movement serves both Orthodox and non-Orthodox youngsters, said shlichah Noga Levtzion Nadan.

England also has activities for older teens, said Alex Brookes, education worker in London.

Among joint projects already under way is the use of madrichim (counsellors) from England, at Canadian camps.

Israel programs have also served to unite the participants. The Turkish contingent is careful to avoid being perceived as Zionistic, lest members be considered disloyal to their country.

Delegates from Istanbul reported that Turkey's 25,000 Jews are allowed to practise their religion freely and there is no problem visiting Israel. They were happy to see the Israeli and Turkish armies working together to help recent earthquake victims, they said.

Among Jewish club activities, there are Jewish holiday celebrations, Israeli folkdancing and, recently, sending clothes, money and water to Turkish earthquake victims.

The convention has "really given a kick-start" to Canadian participants, said CYJ shaliach Ryan Hass.

In addition to the Torontonians, there were participants from Vancouver, Edmonton and Halifax.

The public is cordially invited to attend a lecture given by

SENATOR WLADYSLAW BARTOSZEWSKI

on the topic of

"CODE NAME: ZEGOTA"

The Heroic Story of One Polish Organization's Clandestine Efforts to Save Jews During the Holocaust

DATE: Tuesday, October 19, 1999
TIME: 7:30 p.m.
PLACE: Beth Habonim Synagogue
5 Glen Park Avenue
(one block north of Bathurst & Glencairn)

Senator Wladyslaw Bartoszewski* is a founding member of Zegota and is recognized as a Righteous Gentile by Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, Israel.

A noted historian and speaker, Mr. Bartoszewski was imprisoned by the German Nazis in World War II, during the Soviet Stalinist period that followed, and during the period of martial law in Poland in the 1980s. A key figure in the Solidarity movement, Mr. Bartoszewski served as the Foreign Minister of the Government of Poland from 1994 to 1995.

During his presentation, Mr. Bartoszewski will tell the moving story of Zegota's attempts to save Jews during the Holocaust, and of his continuing attempts to build understanding between Poles and Jews. Mr. Bartoszewski will also discuss his current efforts to better relations between Poland and Germany. The lecture, which will be given in German with simultaneous translation, will be preceded by a short film on Zegota narrated by Eli Wallach.

די איינציקע שווער־אינדוסטריע אין שטאָט איז געווען די פאַבריק פון אויל, ליכט און זייף, אונטער דער האַנדלמאַרקע „העלפאַנד", וואָס האָט געהערט צו דעם ייִדישן אַריסטאָקראַטישן מאַגנאַט, אליעזר מאַנדעלבוים, א נאַציאָנאַלער ייִד, א נדבן, א פילאַנטראָפּ, א פּיקח און א קלוגער סוחר. די פראָדוקציע פון אויל, ליכט און זייף איז געווען פאַפּולער אין גאַנץ פּולן.

Jews being kidnapped in Russian Caucasus

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — Yuri Izmailov, a well-known member of the Jewish community in Makhachkala, the capital of the breakaway republic of Dagestan, was kidnapped last winter and held near the border with Chechnya.

The reason: His captors wanted to get ransom money from his relatives or to sell him into slavery to Chechens.

After six months of living in a basement, eating only bread and water and sleeping on a dirt floor, Izmailov, 45, knew he had to take action.

He managed to dig an underground passageway and escape onto the street, walking away unsuspected, he believes, because his 6-month-old beard made people think he was one of the Wahabbites, a local radical Muslim group.

But that wasn't the end of the problem for Izmailov or his family, which before his escape had managed to bargain the ransom price down to $50,000.

A family celebration of his escape was interrupted by two armed men, who burst into their house. The ensuing shooting left several dead and others, including Izmailov, badly wounded.

Izmailov again managed to survive and shortly thereafter, the entire family left Makhachkala, the Dagestani capital. Some of them went to Israel.

Jewish kidnappings in the Caucasus have become more frequent in the past year. Some 15 to 20 Jews are currently being held in the Makhachkala region alone, according to Karen Gurshumov, a leader of the local Jewish community.

As the kidnappings show, the situation of the Jews in the predominantly Muslim republics of Russia's northern Caucasus is precarious.

There is growing instability and escalating conflict in the region. Chechen rebels have twice invaded neighboring Dagestan and are widely blamed for terrorist bombings that have killed hundreds in Moscow and southern Russia. Chechen leaders say their goal is to establish a fundamentalist Islamic state in the region.

In recent weeks, Russia has bombed targets in Chechnya, prompting a stream of refugees from the region and fuelling speculation that a new Russian war against Chechnya was imminent.

The plight of Jews in the region contrasts sharply with their situation in the era prior to Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, when the anti-Semitism familiar to Jews in most of Russia was virtually non-existent in this region.

Things began to deteriorate in 1989, when the rapid changes in Soviet society resulting from Gorbachev's policies of perestroika led to a sharp surge of nationalism mixed with strong Islamic sentiments.

Anti-Zionist and explicitly anti-Semitic slogans and speeches were heard at mass rallies in Makhachkala, Derbent and other towns in Dagestan.

The increase of anti-Semitism spurred many local Jews to leave the area where their ancestors had lived for at least 12 centuries.

Most left for Israel or resettled in Moscow and other cities in Russia. A few made their way to the United States.

The anti-Semitic rhetoric has escalated in the past year.

Shamil Basayev, a warlord from neighboring Chechnya who has been leading the recent attacks by Islamic rebels in Dagestan, has employed anti-Zionist rhetoric to explain his goals.

"I'm going to fight against Zionism and purge Dagestan, driving out the Yeltsin regime, faithful servant of world Zionism," he was quoted as saying at a mass rally in Chechnya a few weeks ago.

Aslan Maskhadov, president of the self-proclaimed Chechen republic, has made similar comments.

Anti-Semitic rhetoric has escalated in past year

The latest reports from Dagestani Jewish centres say that a new outburst of war – an invasion of Dagestan territory by Chechen fighters and Islamic fundamentalists, followed by a massive operation of Russian federal troops inside Chechnya – could be drawing near.

Jewish activists there say that many of the 12,000 remaining Jews are preparing to pull out of Dagestan, heading for Israel or for relatives in Moscow, and that houses and apartments are being sold for a nominal price or are simply abandoned.

Meanwhile, the area in which the kidnappings are taking place is widening.

Two main factors explain the phenomenon. First, as a result of the growing instability and weakening of the Russian state, the traditional clan system has resurfaced in the Caucasus region. The Mountain Jews, as they are known, are fewer in number than before, and thus they have become easy prey for extortion and kidnapping in what has become a popular profession in this poorest part of Russia.

Second, there exists a deeply rooted belief that the worldwide Jewish community, and above all the State of Israel, would never forsake their fellow Jews and would rush to help pay any ransom that the kidnappers demand.

These cases are usually not reported by mass media, and the only scant information comes from local Jewish sources. Here are some of this year's cases:

• Volodya Fayil, 14, who lived with his mother after his father left for Israel, kidnapped in Makhachkala in May;

• Anatoly Babayev, 32, kidnapped in Buynaksk;

• Naftali Muzhov, 67, also from Buynaksk;

• Albert Yunayev, 33, kidnapped in Khasav-Yurt.

The kidnappers are believed to be particularly on the lookout for Israelis visiting the region.

In July, Laura Likhtman, 18, came from Israel to spend a month with her grandmother and her sister, currently living in Nalchik, the capital of Kabardino-Balkariya, another autonomous republic inside Russia near Chechnya.

In Nalchik, Likhtman saw one of her former schoolmates. The girl called Likhtman to tell her that her boyfriend would pick her up in his car. The young man, an ethnic Chechen, did indeed pick Likhtman up – and then disappeared with her.

Likhtman's relatives later received a call demanding a ransom of $1 million for her return. The ransom has since been reduced to $100,000.

During his visit to Moscow in early August, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak raised the issue of the kidnappings in his talks with Sergei Stepashin, who was then his Russian counterpart.

Likhtman's whereabouts are still not known, and a spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy in Moscow declined to speak about the issue.

JERUSALEM — Nine Israelis returning from a vacation abroad on Friday, Oct. 1, became the first Israeli travellers to come home through the new Palestinian airport in Gaza.

Ironically, their arrival coincided with the delay of the Palestinian safe-passage route through Israel.

While Israeli and Palestinian Authority (PA) officials couldn't agree on security issues for the route connecting Gaza and the West Bank and therefore delayed its intended opening, a group of Israelis returned from Kenya to Israel via PA-controlled territory.

And it wasn't the Palestinians who questioned their arrival. In fact, Yitzhak Tujman, one of the Israelis who arrived at the airport in Dahaniya, said the Palestinians gave his group a warm welcome. The Israeli border guards, however, questioned the group extensively.

Israeli security officials said the action taken by the group was illegal, since an ordinance issued by the Defence Ministry prohibits the use of the Palestinian airport by Israeli citizens.

The affair began when Tujman and his friends were travelling in Kenya. En route to the airport, the group was delayed by a traffic accident, and upon arrival, they were told they had missed their flight to Tel Aviv and would have to buy new tickets to Israel via Egypt.

The group landed in Egypt on Thursday evening, only to learn that they needed a visa to enter and stay in that country. So the four couples and one man travelling alone had to take the first available flight to Israel. The earliest direct flight from Egypt to Tel Aviv was scheduled for Sunday.

"We had two alternatives: We could go back to Kenya or go to Gaza," said Eli Zino, president of the Hapoel Beersheva soccer team who had a game at 3 p.m. Friday.

Added Tujman: "A few people in the group are shomer Shabbat, and one was even a chatan Bereshit [for Simchat Torah]."

So they took an Egypt Air flight to the Palestinian airport in Dahaniya, which opened with great fanfare last December.

Palestinian authorities were surprised to find the Israelis aboard the plane, but treated the group well, Tujman said. As part of the airport's procedure, worked out in negotiations with Israel, the passengers were all put on buses after landing, to be taken to an Israeli checkpoint for screening.

The Israeli security officials wanted to know how the group got to Dahaniya.

Told that Israelis are barred from using the airport, Tujman told The CJN: "I didn't feel anything was wrong. I just wanted to get home. We didn't know [our arrival] was anything out of the ordinary."

The nine Israelis persuaded airport security officials to let them leave when the religious members of the group reminded the authorities that they could not travel after the start of Shabbat.

Instead of going back through the airport with other passengers, they left through the Israeli checkpoint and went to Beersheva by cab.

Palestinian officials were delighted to have them use the airport. "We want our airport to be used by everyone," said Brig.-Gen. Sayez Zaidan, head of Palestinian civil aviation. But he said in future any Israelis using the airport would have to leave from the main airport gate, not the Israeli checkpoint.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 4

• Aharon Domb, director of the Yesha Council, an umbrella organization representing settlers told Yediot Achronot that if the nation decides to evacuate settlements, "I will accept that decision democratically." At the same time, he said the settlement movement "must do everything to stop any evacuation."

Oct. 5

• Israel and the PA worked out an agreement that provides a "safe passage" route for Palestinians traveling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The 28-mile highway route leads across Israel from the northern tip of the Gaza Strip to the southern part of the West Bank. The route is to operate at least 10 hours a day, seven days a week.

Oct. 6

• Israeli military analysts warned Russia not to carve out a security zone in Chechnya as part of Moscow's ongoing battle against Islamic fighters. "This is a prescription for endless war that you cannot win," said retired Gen. Avraham Rotem.

• Israeli travel agent Shlomo Nur was convicted of raping Israel's Miss World, Linor Abargil.

Oct. 7

• Israel announced it will release 151 Arab prisoners this week. (Subsequently, the plans were canceled.)

• Hezbollah gunmen wounded two Israeli soldiers during an attack on an IDF position in southern Lebanon.

Oct. 8

• Israel announced it will issue a stamp next February to honor King Hussein of Jordan. The stamp will be the first honoring a leader of an Arab country.

• The Supreme Court heard a request to halt expansion of Ma'aleh Adumim, the largest community in the West Bank. They did not make a ruling, but their comments indicated that the matter must be left to the government and not to the court.

Far-right makes sharp gain in Austrian election

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Sharp electoral gains by Austria's far-right Freedom party have sounded alarm bells far beyond Austria's borders and made controversial party leader Jorg Haider a key player in national and international politics.

The Freedom party surged to second place in the country's Oct. 3 general election, riding a law-and-order, anti-immigrant platform that also criticized Austria's membership in the European Union and promised to change a stagnant political system.

It captured just over 27 percent of the vote, an increase of more than five percent over the last elections in 1995, and the best showing by a far-right party in Europe since the end of World War II.

The Social Democrats remained the largest party, but dropped to 33.4 percent from 38 percent in 1995. The Freedom party stood just 14,000 votes ahead of the conservative Peoples party, which won 26.9 percent, slightly down from 28 percent in 1995.

The final results won't be known until 200,000 absentee ballots are counted.

As Austrian politicians begin the difficult process of forming a new government, the gains put Haider, 49, the son of Nazi supporters, into the position of potential kingmaker.

Meeting reporters last week, after the outgoing coalition of Social Democrats and the Peoples party formally resigned, Haider, who is notorious for his past praise of the Hitler regime, clearly claimed his party's right to a prominent role.

"We are ready to work, we are ready for government, we are ready to take on responsibility," he declared.

Other right-wing parties across Europe exulted at Haider's success.

But the Freedom party gains drew outraged headlines and worried editorials evoking the spectre of Hitler. Jewish representatives and political figures warned against the consequences.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak was one of the most outspoken. A statement from his office expressed "serious concern" at Haider's success.

"The rise of the extreme right must set off alarm bells among all the people of the free world who still recall the horrors of the Second World War," it said.

Barak called on "all enlightened forces in the world to band together in a common effort to block the spread of the neo-Nazi and fascist plague."

Similarly, Andreas Nachama, the president of the Jewish community of Berlin, called Haider's success "a horrible blow against European unification, against tolerance in Europe, against everything that has been achieved in Austria in the last 10 years.

"I am worried about the influence it might have on Europe, on all the surrounding countries," he said. "It is the wrong sign in the wrong place."

Nonetheless, political commentators in Austria, as well as exit poll interviews, indicated that Haider's success represents a deep-seated desire by Austrians for political change more than a ringing endorsement of xenophobia or neo-Nazism.

Austria has been ruled for decades by the Social Democrats or the Peoples party. For the past 13 years, these two parties have ruled together in a "grand coalition."

Disaffected voters, fed up with what they see as political stagnation, have been gradually deserting the two big parties for years, turning to the Freedom party on the right and the smaller Green party on the left.

Indeed, the Greens also surged forward, winning 7.1 percent, a major increase from 4.8 percent last time.

Green party leader Alexander van der Bellen slammed international media coverage of the election as "hysterical."

"Austria was not a Nazi country before the election and has not become one since," he said.

An exit poll of 2,200 voters carried out by Vienna's Centre for Applied Political Research indicated that 47 percent of Freedom party voters said they backed Haider because of his anti-foreigner policies. But 65 percent said they wanted the party to expose scandal and misbehavior in government, and 63 percent just wanted change.

"Haider was relentless in calling for change," said Edward Serotta, director of the Vienna-based Central Europe Centre for Research and Documentation. "So much so that I think many voters saw him as less of a threat than the establishment that has been in power for so long."

Haider pounded this home again last week. The election result "was not an ideological swing to the right in any way," he said. "It was a swing to justice, which means Austrian voters have a chance that more attention will be paid to their interests."

He said Austria "will get an open, liberal and tolerant political system in which change is something natural."

But Haider's campaign also played on people's fears that immigrants from eastern Europe and elsewhere would inundate the country and take their jobs.

He called for "Austria First" and "Austria for the Austrians."

Shimon Samuels, European director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said the danger rests in the fact that the mainstream has embraced Haider's message.

"In contradistinction to Germany, where extreme right voters are predominantly young, frustrated, unemployed people from former East Germany, the Austrian voters for Haider are mainly from the middle class, living in a comparatively prosperous and crime-free society," he told JTA.

"Their xenophobia is inbred and based upon their fear of modernity. Perhaps Austria was prematurely welcomed into the European Union," he said.

The elections left Austria, for the first time since World War II, with three main parties at about the same strength.

Whatever role the Freedom party plays in the coming Parliament, it is clear that Haider has broken the post-war political mold.

"Haider had one short-term and one long-term goal," said Marta Halpert, director of the European Office of the Anti-Defamation League. "The first was to break up the 'monopoly' on power held by the current grand coalition, the Social Democrats and Peoples party, which have shared power for roughly 50 years.

"His foremost ambition – to become chancellor of Austria – is still up in the air."

Women encouraged to take action about breast care

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If Lillian Sweet can say anything positive about having had breast cancer, it is that it has changed her outlook on life.

Sweet, 46, a Thornhill resident and mother of two sons who was diagnosed with the disease about 2½ years ago, says she has learned to appreciate small things, and not worry about what she has no control over.

"I changed my way of thinking. When I felt nauseous after a session of chemotherapy, I called it indigestion, and I actually felt a bit better. I decided I could use my mind positively; it is more powerful than my body."

When she was first diagnosed, she says, "I went through the typical steps of denial, anger and finally, acceptance. I thought about my risk factors being fairly low and I became very angry, but I had to accept things very quickly. I had no choice.

"People ask me how I lived through my ordeal and that is my answer – if I wanted to survive, I had no choice."

Susan Kadis, 46, a councillor in the City of Vaughan, Thornhill Ward 5, is a seven-year survivor of breast cancer. "I've learned to trust my instincts and be my own health advocate," says the mother of five.

After discovering a lump in her breast, she says, she went to the doctor and he said he was going to monitor it. "He did not feel I was a high risk, because I was young and did not have the disease in my family. As well, I had had two benign lumps in the past, so he felt this was the same thing.

"I persisted however, and when it was biopsied, it came back positive. I lost confidence in that doctor; he had taken a complacent attitude to my life.

"If I had not taken the initial steps, I might not have been alive today. I learned to always, always get a second opinion."

According to Dr. Barb Whylie, director of medical affairs at the Canadian Cancer Society, breast cancer death rates have dropped by about 10 percent since 1986.

"This is partly due to the fact that more women are having mammograms and more tumors are being found at an earlier stage in development," Whylie says.

"When tumors are found early, more women will survive the disease."

Throughout October, breast cancer awareness month, the society is intensifying its efforts to encourage women to take action about their breast health, Whylie says.

Kadis says she was stunned by her diagnosis – "it still doesn't feel real" – and she is motivated to spread the critical messages of early detection and being your own health advocate. "The importance of this cannot be overstated. Nobody is going to care as much about your life as you."

She acknowledges that taking charge of a situation is difficult when "you are feeling very emotional, but taking care of yourself is pivotal to your outcome.

"When my doctor said to monitor the situation, I almost walked out of the room, but then I said, 'No. We have to do something about it.' That was a critical decision."

Sweet encourages women diagnosed with breast cancer to talk to other people. "The Canadian Cancer Society put me in touch with someone, but it was the public health nurse that came to see me after my surgery who was the most helpful.

"She talked me through the various stages, and told me what to expect from chemotherapy.

"The unknown can be very scary. The nurse was instrumental in helping me understand what I was facing. She gave me the worst-case scenario, and she helped me come to the conclusion that you can talk yourself out of symptoms."

Sweet is still being closely monitored, "but I don't dwell on it. There are no guarantees in life."

When you are diagnosed with breast cancer, says Kadis, "surround yourself with positive people, and if you are doing everything that you should be doing, then that is as much as you can do.

"This will maximize your chance of survival. You can't do better than that."

Flutist follows inevitable path

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

Nora Shulman didn't pick up the flute until she was 11 years old.

However, by the age of 24, Shulman had joined the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO) and has served as their principal flutist since 1986.

"Early on, I knew that I very much wanted to play in an orchestra," Shulman said. "But I studied at a time when women couldn't assume that they could easily pursue musical careers."

Growing up in a musical home made her path seem almost inevitable.

Shulman was born in Los Angeles. Both her parents came from musical backgrounds: Her mother's father played theatre organ and her father sang professionally.

"We listened to opera in our house all the time," Shulman said. "It wasn't until I was 8 or 9 years old that I realized that an orchestra could play by itself, and not just as part of an opera.

"I am one of four siblings, and we all perform, or have performed, professionally. One sister is a singer, my brother plays cello, and my younger sister plays violin with the Utah Symphony.

"We were raised in a home with limited financial means, but it was imperative that we all had lessons," she said.

Her principal teachers have included Louise De Tullio, Luella Howard and Sheridan Stokes.

In the last year of her bachelor's degree at California State University at Northridge, Shulman began to audition.

"I accepted the position of second flute with the Denver Symphony," she said. "But, I knew that Denver wasn't my ultimate goal.

"When I was eventually hired by the TSO in 1974, I came to Toronto not knowing very much about Canada. It was a culture shock – having come from California and the U.S. midwestern environment," Shulman said.

"The fact that you couldn't shop on Sundays, the multiculturalism – there were many subtle differences that made Toronto feel like a foreign city," she said. "Now I feel that Toronto is my home."

Shulman's two children go to a Hebrew day school and she takes pride in their enthusiasm for Jewish music.

"My children listen to all kinds of music," she said. "But I especially enjoy it when they listen to klezmer and to Mandy Patinkin's Mamaloshen."

Nora Shulman

Shulman said it has been difficult juggling being a mother and a performer. There are so many responsibilities with both jobs and it can sometimes be very stressful and a real challenge to give the children what you know they must have.

"On the other hand, it can be a joyful stress," she said. "Having a marriage and children was the most wonderful thing for me.

"I wouldn't discourage anyone from pursuing both a family and a career," Shulman said.

"It's a wonderful thing to have it all, but it does come with a stiff price. Hopefully, my kids will look back and be proud that I achieved what I did, and was still there for them."

Shulman is also an adjunct associate professor at the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto.

As an educator, she feels it is important for the TSO to perform a wide repertoire of music.

The TSO selections tend to be generally conservative rather than adventurous, she said.

"Wouldn't it be wonderful if the symphony could excite audiences with innovative programming."

Shaw actress' talents run in the family

By CELINE MIGDAL
Special to The CJN

NIAGARA-ON-THE-LAKE — Actress Sarah Orenstein, who has been with the Shaw Festival since 1990, practically grew up in the theatre.

"I always knew I wanted to be an actress," said Orenstein, who has the role of seductress Hesione Hushabye in Shaw's Heartbreak House, which continues at the festival until Oct. 31.

The festival's popularity grows each year and this year the productions will continue into mid-November, in the picturesque town that's becoming a major attraction for American tourists, as well as for Canadian theatre lovers.

Orenstein inherited her artistic talent. Her mother, Joan Orenstein, is an actress who has been a popular personality in Montreal's Centaur Theatre for many years. Her father, Henry Orenstein is a graphic artist who recently exhibited his work at the Ashkenaz Festival of Yiddish Culture at Harbourfront.

Her father was a major influence in her decision to go into the theatre, Orenstein said. "I'm not good at painting, so acting became my choice and my passion; at our house, art and acting were always part of our daily discussions."

Orenstein, 36, has acted at the Tarragon Theatre, where she recently performed in two plays, and at the Western Canada Theatre Company, Theatre Passe Muraille and Centaur. She also has television and film credits for Forever Knight and Street Legal, among others.

Actress' talents run in her blood

The young mother of a 2½-year old son looks much younger in person than the temptress in her late 40s she portrays in the darkly drawn, dramatic Heartbreak House, or the independent-minded woman named Lesbia she plays in Shaw's comedy, Getting Married. But she projects the can-do attitude of a veteran performer with enough experience to carry off any role and switch from comedy to drama for a given performance.

"I have a vivid imagination and can put myself in the role easily after discussing it with the director and reading the script," she said.

In her performance as Hesione, the indulgent wife of a husband who refuses to grow up and continues to play Don Juan to as many women as he can fool, she becomes a seductress of any unwary male that stumbles across her path.

Heartbreak House is one of Shaw's bleakest plays, full of disappointment over the foibles of men and women.

However, Orenstein gets a chance to be Lesbia, an independent, self-reliant English lady with a life of her own, in Getting Married. Again, she does this with great verve and is almost unrecognizable as the wily temptress of Heartbreak House.

Asked if she ever performed with her mother, she said the two did Mrs. Klein together at the Tarragon Theatre, where their vitriolic interaction as mother and daughter gave the other members of the ensemble much grief, because they thought the strife was real.

"My mother and I get on well together; that was just good acting. We really enjoy working together," she said, with a laugh in a recent interview.

"We already have a shorthand for working together. We know each other well, and in one play we portrayed the same woman at different stages of her life. I think it's interesting for an audience to see a mother and daughter work together on stage — they have fun trying to figure out what's real and what's not."

Swing singer a long way from Hell's Kitchen

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Actress, dancer, singer and songwriter Lizzie Kurtz was bitten by the showbiz bug when she was 6 years old and her mom brought home the soundtrack from the musical, Annie.

Kurtz has since spent many years developing her talents, and Toronto audiences can now enjoy her in TaurPro Entertainment Inc/ Lutvick Productions International's big band musical review, Forever Swing, Oct. 13 to Nov. 14 at the Winter Garden Theatre.

Forever Swing follows the fictitious Tommy Vickers Band during the late '30s and early '40s as they tour ballrooms and dance halls in North America and then head off to Europe for the war years.

Kurtz is the feature singer in the ensemble cast that includes a 13-piece band. Among her solos are old favorites such as Music Goes Round and Round, I'd Love To Get You On A Slow Boat To China and I've Heard That Song Before.

Kurtz says the auditions were gruelling, but the hardest part was waiting for two weeks to find out if she got the role.

However, according to Jeffrey Latimer, head of TaurPro Entertainment, "I knew Lizzie was right for this show, the moment I saw her. She has a star quality like Bette Midler."

After graduating from Claude Watson School for the Arts, the Toronto native spent two years studying theatre at York University before entering Sheridan College's musical theatre program in Oakville, graduating in 1996. She continued her studies at The School of the Toronto Dance Theatre.

"My first love was acting, but I decided to go into musical theatre because singing came most naturally to me. It is the easiest way for me to express myself," she said.

Lizzie Kurtz

Inspired by singers Jann Arden and Lisa Loeb, Kurtz devotes her time to composing her own material when she's not on the stage.

"After Forever Swing, I'm hoping to release a demo CD of songs, hopefully to be picked up by a record label," she said.

Attracted by the lure of the Great White Way last year, Kurtz packed her bags.

"I went to New York to audition for musicals," she said. "When I got there, there wasn't a lot happening.

"One of my goals was to study at the Martha Graham School of Dance; so that's what I did with my days, because it was extremely hard to work on Broadway if you were not American," she said.

Kurtz spent two months living in the heart of New York City.

"I lived on 42nd Street in Hell's Kitchen. It was really interesting. There were cops all around all the time. I actually felt quite at home there. I do well in urban chaos. I'm less stressed when there is that kind of noise around me; it becomes soothing to me after awhile," Kurtz said.

Kurtz said she was encouraged by an experience that happened when she was living in New York, and she plans to return there next year.

One night, around midnight, she ventured out alone, making her way to Don't Tell Mama, a cabaret bar frequented by Broadway actors.

"I got up and performed my stuff and the response was really good," she said. "It was from this response that I decided I could take my singing and songwriting further.

"My purpose for going back down to New York would be to take my demo CD and shop it."

Kurtz also wants to pursue her dream of acting in non-musical productions. She said she especially wants to act in some great Canadian plays. Another goal is to audition one day for the Shaw Festival in Niagara-on-the-Lake.

The actress is currently carving a name for herself in the jingle and voice-over worlds of television, radio and film.

For tickets to Forever Swing, call TicketMaster at 416-827-5555.

Veteran theatre actor comfortable in role of tortured composer

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Marc Blitzstein is a central character in It's All True, a play by Jason Sherman which deals with the strange events surrounding the staging of The Cradle Will Rock in New York in 1937.

Blitzstein, the tortured Jewish composer of The Cradle Will Rock, is being played by Joseph Ziegler, a non-Jew who feels very comfortable in the role.

Ziegler, a veteran of Stratford and Shaw festivals, and Vickie Papavs are the only new cast members of this Necessary Angel production which was originally produced earlier this year at Tarragon Theatre.

The Cradle Will Rock, Blitzstein's worker opera, was directed by a then 22-year-old Orson Welles. The day the show was to open, the government in Washington, which was funding the play through a make-work project, padlocked the doors of the theatre, censoring the play because of its pro-labor, anti-capitalist stance.

Ziegler said Blitzstein was a complicated individual who was unnerved by Welles' casting methods. A relative neophyte in the New York scene, Blitzstein was at the time trying to cope with the death of his wife, the inspiration of his work, especially The Cradle Will Rock which he dedicated to her memory.

Blitzstein died a tragic death in the hospital many years later as the result of a beating in a Caribbean alley, Ziegler said.

Joseph Ziegler

"Blitzstein was a big admirer of Bertolt Brecht and played a song for him about the exploitation of a worker. Brecht liked it but suggested that it should be turned into a play about how the law courts sell the worker out. The Cradle Will Rock resulted," Ziegler said.

Welles is played by Victor Ertmanis, and Richard Binsley is John Houseman, the producer. Melody Johnston portrays Olive Stanton, Martin Julien is Howard da Silva, and the director is played by Richard Rose.

It's All True is at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre, 12 Alexander Street, with previews from Oct. 12, opening Oct. 14, and running until Nov. 14.

AUTHORS FESTIVAL SET FOR OCT. 20 TO 30 AT HARBOURFRONT

Some 50 authors are booked to appear at the 20th annual International Festival of Authors, slated for Oct. 20 to 30 at Harbourfront.

The list includes impressive talent, both domestic and foreign. A glance at the program offers convincing evidence of the fully integrated role that Jewish authors play in the English-language literary scene.

Participants include: Torontonian Anne Michaels, whose new book of poetry, Skin Divers, was recently published; Grace Paley, New York-born daughter of Russian-Jewish immigrants, whose short stories are gems; Torontonian Phyllis Grosskurth, biographer of Lord Byron, Melanie Klein and others.

Also included are Thomas Keneally, Australian author of 20 novels, including Schindler's List; Joyce Maynard, whose exposé of her relationship with J.D. Salinger made international headlines; Alberto Manguel, the renowned writer, translator and anthologist now living in Calgary; Bernard Slade, playwright whose works include Same Time, Next Year.

Festival director Greg Gatenby has come up with some very innovative pairings for the series of public interviews.

For instance, he's asked journalist Jack Batten to interview mystery writer Sara Paretsky, filmmaker David Cronenberg to interview Michaels, architect Jack Diamond to interview South African writer Achmat Dangor, journalist Rick Salutin to interview Manguel, journalist Noah Richler to interview Lebanese writer Hassan Daoud.

These names might give you a hint of the wealth of talent at the festival. Box office, 973-4000. Web site, www.readings.org.

The Play's the Thing: The Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto has arranged a series of three staged readings to mark the 10th anniversary of its Canadian Jewish Playwriting Contest. The works of new and previous winners of the contest will be honored.

Robert Majzel's This Night the Kapo, a powerful drama that confronts truths about human nature and the effect of the Holocaust on family relationships, opens the series Nov. 4, 8 p.m. at the Bloor JCC. Presented as part of Holocaust Education Week, the reading is directed by Jordan Merkur.

A reading of Beth Kaplan's Gordin in America, which examines the life of Jewish-American playwright Jacob Gordin, takes place Feb. 6. This year's winning play is Einstein's Gift, by Vern Theissen. A reading is scheduled for May 2000.

Series ticket, $25, single ticket $10; free for Bloor JCC members. 924-6211.

How To Sell Your Home Yourself and Avoid Paying Commission!

Toronto - A new report is now available to assist those home sellers who are serious about marketing and selling their own home.

Like thousands of other homeowners, you want to sell your house. Except unlike most of them, you want to sell it yourself, without the use of a real estate agent.

Why? Probably because you want to save the commission.

Sure! Why not. I can't blame you one bit. The thought of saving thousands of dollars certainly is appealing.

FREE REPORT WILL SHOW YOU HOW TO SAVE MONEY!

Call anytime 24 hrs., 7 days a week: 1-800-550-0059 and enter #ID 5260. Your report will be sent by mail, free, no cost, no obligation. Get this report before making any selling decisions.

"I was a lousy ball player!'

86-year-old reveals shocking secret:

By FRED NARVEY
Special to The CJN

I was a first baseman. My teammates told me that I was a good first baseman because I was left-handed. At the age of 17 I believed them. But now that I am 86 years old, the truth can be told ... I was a lousy ball player.

You see, it was like this. We had the best pitcher in town, namely Harry Broverman, whom no one could hit, but no one. The only guys whoever reached first base were the ones that Harry walked. So I had a nice easy position.

Mind you, I managed to catch the ball occasionally during practice, but when it came to a real game, I had an awful problem. As soon as I heard the roar of the crowd, my knees would start shaking and my hands would tremble. All I could do was pray, "Please Harry, strike the bums out already!"

The year was 1930. It was the top of the ninth inning of the final game. At stake was the championship of the junior division in the Rotary League. The opposition was up to bat and the score was 3-2, in their favor. This was the inning that would tell the tale.

Harry struck out the first batter in short order. The second batter was a cream puff who Harry always struck out. Then the impossible happened. The cream puff hit the ball! A roar went up from the crowd and I got the shakes. The shortstop scooped up the ball and whipped it down to first base like a professional ball player. To my everlasting shame, I dropped the ball!

"Safe at first!" shouted the umpire.

The shortstop looked at me murderously. Harry Broverman didn't say anything. Harry never said anything, but I knew that look of his which said, "Do I have to do all the work on this ball team, you shmo?"

Captain Simon Listernick, our back catcher, was spitting furiously in all directions – a sure sign that he was extremely unhappy.

The opposition must have figured out that I was the weak spot on the team because they put in a left-handed hitter. My hands and feet were still shaking from the last batter who was safe on first base. Now I had an additional problem. The Coca-Cola was pushing up the salami sandwich I had for supper.

In my despair, I put my hands together and silently prayed the same old prayer. "Please Harry..."

Just then, I heard the crash of leather against wood. The crowd roared and the runner on first base made a dash for second. All of a sudden, the crowd stopped roaring and began applauding! I jumped on first base and looked around to see what was happening. To my surprise, I found the ball safely in my hands! A double play, and no one was more amazed than me. I walked off the field trying hard to look modest...

Now, it was the bottom of the ninth inning. Nate Lepkin, our excellent left fielder, was the first batter for our side. He connected with a hard drive along the third base line that landed him a two bagger! Now, if we could only get Nate home we could tie the score, and if we could get another run on top of that – the game and the championship would be ours.

Unfortunately, I was the next batter. All my buddies shook their heads and said, "Oi vey," in unison.

Captain Listernick spit east and west and muttered, "The no-hit wonder!"

Could you blame them? I hadn't made a safe hit all season.

However, the opposition wasn't aware of my brilliant batting average, so they took elaborate precautions. Since I was a left-handed "hitter," the right fielder moved over to the first base line, the centre fielder moved to the right field and the left fielder moved to centre field.

I picked up my bat and approached the plate with the enthusiasm of a condemned man. The crowd began to shout and I missed the first pitch by a mile.

"Strike him out, strike him out!" I heard from all sides. I silently vowed never to have salami and Coke again before an important game.

The pitcher wound up and let go. I closed my eyes and swung. The noise was deafening. When I opened my eyes, the ball was far out in left field, and there was no one there to catch it!

I would have fainted right there on the home plate, but there wasn't time. Captain Listernick was spitting in my direction, "Run, Shmo! Run!" So I ran.

When I got to first base, Harry Broverman, the pitcher (whom no one ever hit) was hollering from the sidelines, "Run, Speedy, run!" I rounded second base and was three quarter of the way to third, when our star outfielders, Hy Smordin and his little brother Benny shouted, "Shlemiel! Run back and touch second!" I made skid marks, raced back and touched second. My team mates were hysterical. "Keep going, keep going!"

I was all out of breath, but I ran to third base on my wobbly legs and jumped on the sack with both feet. The Smordin brothers were jumping up and down and shouting, "They are still searching for the ball in the tall grass!"

I staggered across the home plate and collapsed.

CORRECTION

The article, "Young athletes join JCC Maccabi Games" (Sept. 23), omitted that the girls basketball team won the Gold Medal. In addition, the boys baseball team won the Silver Medal, and the first Games took place in Memphis in 1982. The CJN regrets the errors.

The Inside Back

Moshe Nussbaum: Media star

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

I've worked in a few newsrooms besides the genteel and unhurried one here at The CJN, and although I have never heard it actually uttered, the phrase "Jews is news" strikes me as truer now than ever before. What else to make of the media frenzy that surrounded last month's tragic death of 88-year-old Moshe Nussbaum, on his way to pre-dawn synagogue services, only to die after being hit by a four-wheel-drive SUV?

The item led that day's newscasts on at least three radio stations and several television supper-hour shows; the accident and Nussbaum's funeral were front-page (above the fold) news in the Toronto Star's extra-large circulation Saturday edition (also providing the paper with a photo of the reclusive Paul Reichman); and it was played prominently by the Sun and the Globe and Mail, with the Sun following up with an eye-glazing column on how sad it all was. Only the National Post stayed away, probably surmising, in a moment of sobriety, that another traffic death in Toronto was not worthy of cross-country attention.

Even the lead detective on the file noted that the case received "more than the usual" media attention.

While the Post's stance seemed a mite cold, it is journalistically more sound than those of the other media outlets. While the hit-and-run death of an 88-year-old man is heartbreaking, and has all the elements of a good spot-news story, Jewish consumers of the secular media had every reason to wonder at the plain overkill on the story, and how Nussbaum became "a prominent member of Toronto's Jewish community," as he was repeatedly described.

This is not meant to be disrespectful, but Nussbaum was not a prominent member of the Toronto Jewish community. He was rather a leader (pillar is a better word) of a very small, closed, low-profile and inaccessible part of the city's Jewish population: the ultra-Orthodox, far-right Agudah movement. I venture to say that most everyone else – the overwhelming majority of Jews in and around Toronto – had never heard of him until his death.

The media, including The CJN, like to use the phrase "Jewish community." It's tidy and convenient. But the Jews of Toronto, with their huge range of affiliations, involvement and political leanings, are as far from being a monolith as are Anglicans. When was the last time you heard CFRB refer to "the Anglican community"?

(I remember Globe columnist Jeffrey Simpson once politely tearing a strip out of a CBC commentator for using the phrase "the Jewish vote." "There's no such thing," Simpson snapped, pointing out that Canada's Jews do not vote, or live, in lock step.)

Only the Globe, in its coverage of the Nussbaum accident, indirectly hinted at a larger issue here: Nussbaum, it reported, was this year's 69th traffic fatality (and 13th hit-and-run) in Toronto. What of the other 68? How many were leaders in their religious communities? How many were elders in their church? How many contributed to charity? How many were as sweet and gentle as Moshe Nussbaum? We'll never know.

But Nussbaum's story was a no-brainer for the media, and his death was splashed over the pages and airwaves with inexplicable and inexcusable excess. The over-the-top coverage was capped three days later by the Star, which ran a story saying Nussbaum's 90-year-old widow, Chaya, was too frail to be told of the tragedy. This is news?

A special brickbat to CFTO: On the same day as the Nussbaum mishap, the station's late broadcast began with the announcer breathlessly reporting the "latest anti-Semitic attack" in Toronto, and bang, we see Larry Skolnik's blood splattered all over the garage of his apartment building. Despite later assurances from police and Canadian Jewish Congress that Skolnik, a 63-year-old Orthodox Jew, had been mugged, and nothing else, the station interviewed two of Skolnik's neighbors, both of whom were certain this was another hate crime. Good enough for CFTO, which more and more is going the "if it bleeds, it leads" route nauseatingly perpetuated by U.S. channels.

If this is news, maybe I'm in the wrong business.

WE SELL Inglis FOR LESS

STUFFED CABBAGE SOUP

2 lbs. flanken
2 - 28 oz. cans crushed tomatoes
2 qts water
1 large onion, sliced
1 cabbage, shredded
1 tblsp chopped garlic
1/2 lb. whole cranberries
1 cup plumped currants
2 oz. maple syrup
1 cup ketchup
2 oz. sherry wine
1 tblsp onion powder
1 tblsp garlic powder
2 cups cooked rice
2 lbs. cooked, chopped meat
salt & pepper

In a large soup pot, top flanken with crushed tomatoes and water. Cover and cook over medium heat approx. 45 minutes. Add remaining ingredients except the rice, chopped meat, salt and pepper. Cook until cabbage is tender. Add cooked rice and chopped meat. Add salt and pepper as needed. Adjust all seasonings if necessary.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My wife died many years ago and we did not have any children. I really do not have anyone to rely on, and I am very worried should something happen to me. I have a heart condition and arthritis and I'm very concerned about who will take care of my belongings and my funeral when I pass on. I want to know that arrangements will be made according to what I want. What should I do?

BSS

Dear BSS,

It is understandable that you are feeling so anxious about your future. I recommend addressing this problem first by consulting a lawyer (or notary) and writing a will. In your will, you can identify an executor who will be responsible for ensuring that your belongings and assets are distributed according to your wishes.

Secondly, I urge you to visit a funeral home that offers a pre-arranged funeral option. You can make the arrangements for the type of funeral you would like and be assured that everything will happen as you want and that your concerns are addressed.

By taking these steps, I think you will feel more comfortable and at ease and less concerned and worried about your future.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse represents the management and staff of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

CITYPLACE

The Downtown Village.

Neighbourhood.

The shape of things to come.

Catch the style and spirit of downtown Toronto as we count down to the new millennium.

Never before has there been so much to do, so much to see, and so much to experience in the heart of the city's theatre and sports districts.

Between downtown and the waterfront you'll discover live performances from Broadway blockbusters to sidewalk mimes. Jazz on the street, rock concerts, classical masterworks, funk and just plain old people watching.

Check out a hot new musical at The Princess of Wales Theatre, the symphony at Roy Thomson Hall, off Broadway at The Royal Alexandra Theatre, international superstars at the Air Canada Centre and avant garde at Harbourfront. Check out the clubs on Adelaide and Richmond.

Grab a latte or a penné aribiatta at one of King Street's many outdoor cafés and bistros. Dine in fine style at The Boston Club, Canoe, Avalon or numerous other epicurean hideaways in the area. Impromptu picnics with good friends come to life at Loblaws on Queens Quay and, while you're in the neighbourhood, pick a bottle of your favourite wine from the city's biggest Vintages store. Of course, you don't want to miss Saturday mornings at the old St. Lawrence Market where the action starts at 3am sharp.

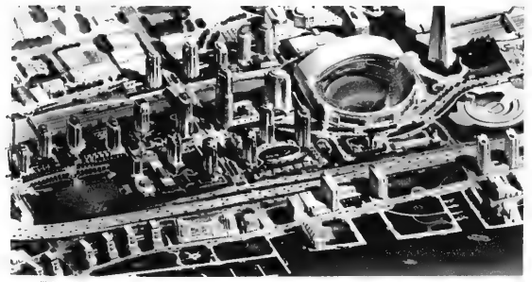
Live in the city of the future. An urban village that encompasses everything you want, surrounded by everything the city has to offer. The genesis is here and there's no place like it to live anywhere else on the planet.

Over the next decade the skyline of Toronto will dramatically change and part of this change will be driven by the development of CityPlace, the city's first downtown master planned community. An urban environment designed to create a vibrant, exciting residential neighbourhood through the creation and application of exceptional design. Every aspect of the urban goodlife has been considered and organized at CityPlace in a way that is truly user friendly and totally connected and integrated to the city, the waterfront and surrounding neighbourhoods.

The grass is greener. CityPlace will have more green space than any other neighbourhood in downtown Toronto. The parkland system, carefully designed and woven into the fabric of the community, will include bicycle paths, jogging trails, ponds and waterways and major park space in which to relax and play...including an eight acre "central park" with sports and recreation facilities. The end result will be a "greenway" that connects Fort York to the waterfront park system of Harbourfront and the western Beaches.

Brilliant, beautiful landscapes. The streets at CityPlace are brilliantly livable and designed to be safe. Decorative lighting, street furnishings and carefully-selected paving materials will extend throughout the community providing a strong "sense of place." Boulevards, wide sidewalks, trees and greenery are the perfect canvas and frame for charming "Parisian style" sidewalk cafés, shops, stores and ground-level homes.



Illustrations are artist's representations

Shop 'til you drop. Every Toronto neighbourhood has its own unique and charming blend of shops, and CityPlace will be no exception. Focused on and around Spadina Avenue, just south of Front Street, the community shopping district will provide close, convenient streetfront stores, a neighbourhood supermarket, and a variety of restaurants and services for residents. In addition, CityPlace is surrounded by the urban richness of Toronto's Entertainment, Harbourfront and Downtown shopping districts.

It's a wonderful day in the neighbourhood. An important part of any fully-furnished neighbourhood are the community amenities available to the residents. At CityPlace there will be daycare centres, an elementary school, community centre and public library. These amenities, coupled with the abundance of greenspace and other facilities, will make CityPlace a wonderful new neighbourhood in downtown Toronto.

New vistas in architecture and design. Perhaps the most striking aspect of CityPlace will be reflected in the design of space and architecture. Buildings unlike anything preceding them in Toronto. Residential towers that are tall and slender with a limited number of suites per floor. A new urban neighbourhood offering unparalleled space and light, maximizing the ability to provide unobstructed sight lines to the lake and city. Towers of glass and steel that reflect sunrise off the water and the translucent cloudscapes of a summer day. Floor to ceiling windows, innovative and interesting living spaces, exceptional spaces for lifestyle amenities, environmentally compliant with a technology infrastructure designed for today and "overbuilt" for the capacity and capability of tomorrow. This is the vision of master planning that is becoming a reality at CityPlace. A multi-billion dollar dream that will change, forever, the skyline of Toronto. Be a part of it.

The future isn't what it used to be.

digitally enhance your lifestyle

you'll enjoy a lifestyle enhanced by a $30 million, state-of-the-art fibre optic digital network developed by TELUS in partnership with GTE, Lucent Technologies and other preeminent high-tech firms. We call it the Digital Neighbourhood. It means speed-of-light home delivery of a wide array of services including 'Digital Video On Demand' movies, on-line shopping, restaurant and entertainment guides, Internet access, news, music and more. A small set-top box and wireless keyboard let you use your TV as a 24-hour portal into the CityPlace community and beyond. Best of all, the set-top box, keyboard and network access fees are all included in the cost of your new home.

fibre optic network connects you to the Digital Neighbourhood and the Internet at anticipated access rates up to 50 times faster than high-speed cable, up to 2000 times faster than a standard 56k modem, allowing you to download almost anything in seconds. You can access the network through either your television or computer, and you'll enjoy the same power and speed, whichever you choose.

to the Digital Neighbourhood, you'll discover a virtual world of continuously updated lifestyle information including restaurant and entertainment listings, information on local sports venues, a local retail business index, transit schedules and much more.

is your own virtual concierge, allowing you to reserve CityPlace recreational facilities such as the theatre, fitness centre and meeting rooms, book tee-off times on the new CityPlace Golf Course, and access CityPlace community updates and event information. The Digital Neighbourhood even keeps track of any bookings you make by updating an on-screen personal calendar that you can refer to or update anytime. You can also arrange dry cleaning, flower delivery and dinner reservations.

Through a network of high-tech surveillance cameras, the Digital Neighbourhood will allow you to view a variety of entrances and selected common areas within your building, and authorize entry at the click of a mouse.

you'll be able to order movies in a variety of categories, eliminating the need to venture to a video store. And unlike movie theatres, the Digital Neighbourhood lets you pause, fast-forward and rewind your movie selection with full VCR functionality, while enjoying state-of-the-art digital picture quality.

the shape of things to come

Concord Adex, the developers of CityPlace, have spent countless hours working closely with some of the world's best architects, planners, engineers, technology professionals and designers to develop the vision and infrastructure of the perfect urban community. An integral part of the whole process was the planning and design of Matrix, the first residential towers.

For these landmark buildings we retained the services of internationally renowned architects Page + Steele and James Cheng, Architect, and Cecconi Simone, noted interior designers.

Sol Wassermuhl, President of leading architectural firm Page + Steele, is excited about the project. "The key design elements are two elliptical forms clad in a sweeping, curved, floor-to-ceiling glass skin. Just as a circle is the symbol of perfection, the ellipse is a circle with attitude...the perfect form for a building in this urban environment."

James Cheng and Cecconi Simone share his enthusiasm. "The developer had the expertise, experience and commitment to create this amazing vision...it's our great fortune to be involved in the process."

Matrix, the first residential buildings at CityPlace, will be located on the south west corner of Front Street and Blue Jays Way.

Twenty-eight stories of green glass and steel sex appeal.

Joseph Burg

Elder statesman dies

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hundreds of people, including a veritable who's who of Israeli leadership past and present, attended the funeral of Joseph Burg last Sunday. His family was at his bedside when he died Friday at his home at the age of 90.

Burg was a pillar of religious Zionism in Israel and a government minister for 35 years.

He was born in Dresden, Germany, in 1909 and studied at universities in Berlin and Leipzig, completing a doctorate in philosophy. He was also ordained as a rabbi in Germany before leaving for Palestine in 1939. During the next decade, he taught at the Herzliya high school in Tel Aviv, was active in a number of pre-state institutions and served as an emissary in Geneva and Paris.

Burg was the deputy speaker of the first Knesset and a member of every other Knesset through 1986. Beginning as the youngest minister in the government in 1951, he presided over a range of different offices during the next four decades:

Health, Welfare, Interior, Police and Religious Affairs.

His public roles included terms as president of the world Mizrachi movement and chairman of the board of Yad Vashem. He was also a founding director of Bar-Ilan University and established the Joseph Burg Chair in Education for Human Values, Tolerance and Peace.

Burg was known for his phenomenal breadth of knowledge and quick wit. A partner for decades in Labor-led coalitions, he held relatively moderate views in regard to the territories captured in 1967.

Before the funeral cortege set out for the Sanhedria cemetery in Jerusalem, Burg's body lay in state at Yad Vashem on Mount Herzl at his request.

The first eulogy was delivered by President Ezer Weizman, who struck a theme that others also repeated. He noted that Burg had said in an interview, "Whatever can be achieved by peaceful means is preferable to any other road."

Allies aware in '42

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — A British student has discovered a 20-page document in the Foreign Office archive that proves conclusively that Britain and the United States knew about the gas chambers and the crematoria at Auschwitz by December 1942.

While it was known that the Allies were aware of the Final Solution and even of the gas chambers by then, this is the first time it has been demonstrated that the Allies knew in 1942 about the crematoria at Auschwitz, where approximately 1.5 million people, 90 percent of them Jews, were killed.

Crematoria in Auschwitz

It was previously thought that the Nazis were able to conceal the purpose of Auschwitz better than they could at other camps, said Richard Breitman, a professor of history at American University and the author of a book on the topic.

The latest find could also reignite debates about why the Allies took no action to disrupt the operation of Auschwitz.

The information was contained in a memorandum, subsequently passed on to the British government, that was handed to then-U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt by Jewish leaders at a White House meeting on Dec. 8, 1942.

It starts by noting that two million Jews had already been

The News in Brief

Canada

Wanted: Rabbis

WINNIPEG — There's a shortage of rabbis in Winnipeg, reports the city's Jewish Post & News. Two local synagogues are seeking replacements for their rabbis, whose contracts expired and who have left the city, while a third congregation is searching for a rabbi to replace its current spiritual leader, who plans to leave the city when his contract expires next summer.

Israel

Bus Mishap Kills 15

JERUSALEM — A bus carrying Israelis on a singles excursion to the north skidded off a rain-slicked road and overturned in a ravine Oct. 9, killing 15 passengers and injuring 39 others. Police said the road near Tiberias was slippery from Israel's first rain in months.

Fighting Cyber-Terror

JERUSALEM — Israel and the United States are joining forces to fight cyber-terror on essential computer networks and databases, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported. The paper said the first working meeting of the committee on counterterrorism will take place in November. The joint committee will also address the threat of biological and chemical warfare.

Rabbi Pleads Guilty

JERUSALEM — The former head of a Jerusalem yeshiva pleaded guilty recently to charges he sexually molested 19 students between 1991 and 1997. Prosecutors in the case of Rabbi Ze'ev Kapelovich, who led the Netivei Meir Yeshiva, have asked that he be sent to jail for 3½ years. The court is expected to announce its sentence next month.

Non-Kosher Request

JERUSALEM — Thirteen Israeli lawmakers recently sent a letter to Knesset Speaker Avraham Burg asking that a non-kosher restaurant be opened in the Knesset building, in addition to the existing kosher kitchen.

Conservatives Win Funds

JERUSALEM — Israel's High Court of Justice has ordered the Religious Affairs Ministry to provide the nation's Conservative movement with some $165,000 in funding. The money had been denied in earlier years because of the ministry's discriminatory policy toward the movement, the court ruled Oct. 7.

Ma'ariv Editor Dies

JERUSALEM — The founder and former editor of the Israeli daily Ma'ariv died Oct. 6 at his desk. Shmuel Schnitzer, 81, who helped found the newspaper in 1948, served as its editor from 1980 to 1982.

World

Zhirinovsky Banned

MOSCOW — Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky and his party were barred from participating in the nation's parliamentary elections in December. The Central Election Committee barred the entire slate of the Liberal Democratic Party after two of its candidates were rejected for failing to disclose some of their assets.

Cemetery Surveillance?

BERLIN — A German Jewish leader has called for video cameras to be installed at Jewish cemeteries in Germany. The call by Andreas Nachama came after more than 100 graves were desecrated at a Jewish cemetery in Berlin earlier this month, and before the discovery last week of a similar incident at a Jewish cemetery in southern Germany.

Disco Plans Scrapped

WARSAW — The governor of a southern Polish province has revoked permission for a disco to be built near the site of the Auschwitz death camp. The Oct. 5 action came in response to protests that noise from the disco would disturb visitors to the site.

Boycott Threats Considered

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Commerce Department is taking recent boycott threats levelled by American Arab and Muslim groups against Burger King, Disney and other companies "very seriously." In a letter responding to concerns expressed by the Anti-Defamation League that the threats violate U.S. anti-boycott laws, the department said its Office of Anti-Boycott Compliance is "monitoring the situation closely" and "will initiate action if, after a full review of the relevant facts, action appears to be warranted."

Ottawa Proposes New War Crimes Law

OTTAWA — The federal government is planning to introduce new legislation on war crimes that would allow for criminal prosecutions of suspects who live in Canada and have been accused of genocide or crimes against humanity.

Ottawa has been stymied in prosecuting suspects in criminal courts ever since 1994, when the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the acquittal of Imre Finta, who had been accused of confining and deporting thousands of Jews from Hungary during World War II.

In 1995, the Justice Department shifted its focus from criminal prosecutions to denaturalizing and deporting accused war criminals.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen praised the proposed changes to the law, which Justice Minister Anne McLellan is scheduled to unveil in the House of Commons in the coming weeks.

Ronen said the government should not abandon its current practice of revocation of citizenship and deportation. He said a two-track system should be adopted.

CJC war crimes committee chair Irving Abella said he's hopeful that a new law will root out both Nazi-era war criminals and those who took part in atrocities in places like Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia.

Slave labor offer rejected as paltry, insulting

'They deprived me of my youth. They deprived me of an education. They deprived me of parental guidance'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rather than calculate how much money he would be owed had he been properly compensated for his slave labor during World War II, Howard Chandler of Toronto says, "Let me tell you not what they should give me, but what they took away from me:

"They deprived me of my youth. They deprived me of an education. They deprived me of parental guidance.

"You try and estimate what that's worth."

That's why Chandler, along with hundreds of thousands of former war-era slave laborers around the world, have turned thumbs down to this month's offer by German industry and government of $3.3 billion (US, or six billion marks, $4.85 billion Cdn.) to compensate Nazi-era slaves.

The German offer would affect some 250,000 concentration camp survivors – 135,000 of them Jewish – who were enslaved by German companies during the war.

They would receive about $8,000 (Cdn.) each, depending on how many seek payments.

It would also compensate between 475,000 and 1.2 million non-Jewish forced laborers from central and eastern Europe who were deported and sent to work in Germany.

Forced laborers would receive about $3,000 each, depending on how many are still alive and how many seek payments.

"It's not enough," says Chandler, 71, who toiled as a slave laborer in Nazi-held Poland. "Let them make a serious offer and get it over with."

Around the world, former forced and slave laborers are denouncing the offer as miserly and insulting.

Chandler agrees. "We would have been better off without it at all. This is very psychologically draining."

But he adds that this is not just a question of money: "They [German industries] should also realize and admit that they did wrong. We were abused, exploited and mistreated. When they were finished with us, they either killed us or let us die."

The offer "is inadequate even by the standards of decency and the basic remuneration for work done," said Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) executive director Jack Silverstone, who has had extensive talks over the years with the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. "It's very, very low."

But German officials say the offer is fair, and final.

"German industry has made a worthy offer and has taken a reasonable path," stated German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, who urged critics of the deal to consider it seriously.

Germany's federal government has offered to contribute two billion marks to former forced laborers not employed directly by German companies, with companies offering a further four billion marks.

A spokesman for the companies said German industry was not willing to pay more. "I don't think that there will be a larger sum. Six billion marks is the best we could do," he told the Reuters news agency.

Krupp, IG-Farben, Siemens, Bayer and Volkswagen are among dozens of German firms known to have used forced labor during World War II.

So far, 35 firms have agreed to support the compensation fund, partly for fear they will end up paying out much more if surviving victims win class-action suits. Germany's largest commercial bank, Deutsche Bank, became involved after questions were raised about its Nazi-era activities.

From 1942 to 1944, Chandler was a slave laborer in the Hermann Goering Werke in Starachowice, in Nazi-occupied Poland. He often worked 16-hour days in a hot smelter, making pig iron for the German war effort.

"There were no changes of clothes. There was no medical attention. There was no rest." Chandler estimates that half of the 6,000 Jewish laborers in that period died from overwork, industrial accidents or malnutrition.

There are roughly 200 survivors of the Hermann Goering Werke left in the world; the majority now live in Canada with most of them in Toronto, noted Chandler, who came to Canada in 1947.

A year ago, Chandler, on behalf of the other survivors, wrote to CJC saying they

Introducing Carlo Coen

Walking energetically towards me, smiling, he extended his hand and said: "How do you do? I'm Carlo Coen. I am pleased to meet you." The greeting was a bit more formal than we are used to in Canada. But Coen is not Canadian. He is Italian. His suave, congenial, though cordial, greeting was how I had anticipated it would be.

What I did not anticipate, however, was the remarkable resemblance Coen bears to singer/songwriter, Paul Simon.

Coen is fairer of complexion than Simon, and his hair is lighter than Simon's hair was in the days when Simon had hair. But the deeply penetrating gaze of the dark brown eyes, the taut lips, the shape of the face and the physical stature together, combined to form a strong likeness to the poet singer.

The similarity was mildly distracting at first. Like a youngster speaking to a celebrity, I was fixated on the appearance of the person rather than on his substance.

After only brief moments, however, there was indeed much substance to consider and weigh. Coen's wide-ranging opinions and smoothly expressed observations left no room for daydreaming about the sounds of silence.

A "diplomat" since 1990, Coen is the recently appointed director of the Italian Cultural Institute in Toronto. Located in a handsomely renovated, two-storey, brick house in the arboreal Annex area of town, the Institute has been an arm of the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs since 1990. It is one of three such offices in Canada, the other two being in Montreal and Vancouver.

Coen has served Italy as a cultural attache since 1981, even before the office was subsumed by the Foreign Ministry, in India, Australia and now in Toronto.

The institute's mandate is to foster sound bilateral relations between Canadians and Italians by promoting, for the benefit of Canadians, the diversity and richness of Italian culture. Of course it helps that a great many Canadians are of Italian ancestry. In Ontario alone, there are more than 800,000. But, as Coen emphasized, the Institute's programs are not aimed only at Italian Canadians but rather at the community at large.

The programming he envisions is multifaceted. It will be a fabric of varied weave featuring visual arts, design arts, performing arts and literature. He also intends to buttress the institute's relationship with local colleges and universities by supporting the study of the Italian language, arranging academic symposia and developing exchange programs with interested students.

Carlo Coen

Not forgotten, of course, is the art gallery on the main floor of the institute which Coen hopes to infuse with the creative energy of some of Italy's newest and finest artists.

With Coen as his last name, my curiosity surrounding the possibility that the newly arrived diplomat might be Jewish, led me to ask the inevitable question. Indeed, it was that very possibility that led me to seek the interview with him.

"My father was Jewish; my mother was not. My parents both came out of the war. It was a marriage out of deep love. But it was difficult for my father's family."

As he spoke, he settled further back into his chair. He spoke slowly, deliberately, searching out just the right word to ensure that he was accurately conveying both his thoughts and his emotions.

Coen was born in Rome in 1951. "My parents had planned to call me David. They changed their minds however because I was so small."

His sister, Miriam, was born four years later.

His home was not particularly "Jewish," although he does remember going to synagogue with his father at the High Holy Days on Yom Kippur and on Pesach.

Sadly, however, Coen was destined not to have too many years with his father.

His father, Alessandro Guiseppe, died in 1982 at the age of 57. His mother died not long afterwards when she was in her early 50s.

Coen was posted in New Delhi when he received the news of his father's death. It fell to him to see to the funeral arrangements.

As he relates the story of his father's passing, his voice drops off somewhat, and for the first time in our conversation, he does not look directly at me. He looks past me, focusing on some imaginary spot on the wall behind me, or perhaps someplace else.

"I went to the rabbi to make sure that someone would say the Kaddish after my father. The arrangements were made and I was under the impression that I had to pay him. But the rabbi refused to take any money."

Coen then tells me that during his tenure in Toronto he hopes to make the history of the Italian Jewish community and of some Italian Jews better known to us.

Carlo Coen lives in Toronto with his two young children, ambassadors all, of Italian culture and dignity.

Shalom-K Tours fights to stave off bankruptcy

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shalom-K Tours Ltd., a popular Toronto travel agency that has specialized in trips to Israel for years, is going to court to fight an attempt to have it declared bankrupt.

"We are fighting bankruptcy. We do not intend to go bankrupt," a determined Shalom Even, Shalom-K's founder, told The CJN.

The family-owned travel wholesaler, founded in 1982, is being pursued by the International Air Transport Association (IATA) for money owed to several airlines.

The Montreal-based IATA is seeking to recover $688,000 Shalom-K owes to El Al, $25,000 owed to Air Canada, and over $1,300 owed to Canadian Airlines and American Airlines according to court documents. IATA is pursuing the claims on behalf of the carriers.

The case will be heard in a Toronto court Oct. 27, when IATA will petition to have Shalom-K declared bankrupt.

Shalom-K has also withdrawn its registration from the Travel Industry Council of Ontario (TICO), which monitors the travel business and enforces provincial laws and industry standards. The move effectively means Shalom-K has relinquished its licence and cannot operate as a travel agency in Ontario.

Shalom-K's licence was suspended for 15 days in July "in the public interest," TICO's chief executive officer, Michael Pepper, told The CJN.

In September, TICO moved to revoke Shalom-K's registration permanently, but the agency later withdrew from the council voluntarily, Pepper said.

Shalom-K was originally suspended from the council because it "did not meet its working capital requirements," Pepper said. "We didn't think they were capable of meeting their financial responsibilities."

Pepper said Shalom-K's debts were also a factor in the suspension.

Also in July, the court appointed an interim receiver of Shalom-K.

The agency owes money to El Al for a bloc of several hundred tickets the airline provided over the summer to enable members of Jewish youth groups, such as Young Judaea, to travel to Israel, according to El Al's general manager for Canada, Moshe Shamai.

El Al not paid for tickets

El Al honored the tickets but was never paid for them, Shamai said.

So far, TICO has paid out about $100,000 from its compensation fund to reimburse Shalom-K customers who had put down deposits on their unused tickets, Pepper noted.

He said TICO will try to recover those funds from Shalom-K.

As well, Shalom-K's bank account has been frozen.

Pepper said consumers who paid deposits on unused tickets bought from Shalom-K can apply to TICO for compensation.

An affidavit filed with the court from the interim receiver states there is a $707,328 shortfall in Shalom-K's trust account.

Another affidavit, from the director of financial services for IATA, says Shalom-K's debt to the airlines arose because the agency did not honor its remittances to IATA due to insufficient funds, adding that Shalom-K has "refused to account for the whereabouts of the trust funds despite repeated demands made by IATA."

Shalom-K's Sheppard Avenue East offices were dark last week. An answering machine was handling telephone calls.

Even charged that El Al owes him money, and said his legal woes are the result of a "very-well planned conspiracy."

He said he's preparing a lawsuit against El Al.

TORONTO — The United Way of Greater Toronto has increased funding to four major Jewish communal agencies because they fall into its priority areas for high-need programs and services.

The Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) and the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa have all received more United Way dollars for the coming year.

The other Jewish agencies which benefit from the United Way will see their allocations remain the same for this fiscal year as the previous period.

The United Way has set four priorities for its 1999 campaign: hunger and homelessness, prenatal and postnatal care, helping abused women and their children, and assisting newcomers to settle and integrate.

The agency recently kicked off its 1999 drive, setting a goal of $62.8 million to be distributed to dozens of social services and community agencies.

The Bloor JCC has received $1,988 more than last year to cover increases in salaries and costs. Its allocation is $101,412 this year.

JF&CS received $25,295 more to provide four additional groups per year for abused women, their children and male batterers. This additional funding will help the agency reduce its waiting list. The agency's United Way allocation is $1,366,033.

JVS received a $5,000 boost to enhance staffing at its career employment and counselling program. Its allocation from United Way grew this year to $402,916.

The Free Loan Cassa received a special $12,870 grant for each of the next two years for a part-time financial administrator to implement a recovery program for lost and old loans. The agency's basic United Way allocation remains unchanged at $44,170.

The following Jewish community agencies will see their United Way allocations unchanged for the coming year: the Bathurst Jewish Centre, $369,696; the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, $340,079; the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, $143,080; Circle of Care, $108,981; and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, $45,701.

The Jewish Camp Council of Toronto is also a United Way beneficiary agency. But this year, it requested that its allocation be held back pending a reassessment of the program the United Way funds.

BJC back from financial brink

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The transition of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) from a bankrupt organization to one that is financially stable is completed, said Tom Lobel, the outgoing president.

"Five years ago this building was a disaster," Lobel told the fourth annual BJC meeting recently. "Now we are financially stable, have a good program, but there is still much more to be done."

The largest benefactor to pull the former Jewish Community Centre out of its financial hole was UJA Federation of Toronto, said Lobel, paying special tribute to former Federation president Bernie Ghert.

Lobel also thanked Marty Goldberg and the group of seven who helped him turn the BJC around, and the 20 people who donated $100,000 each to cover possible bank overdrafts. "The risk was real at the time," Lobel said.

"There were no major crises and no minor crises this year and our camping services are our greatest success so far."

Lobel's comments were reflected in treasurer Rick Bornstein's reporting a small profit of $2,000 on the year's operations; a $300,000 increase in revenue was matched by a boost of $300,000 in expenses.

An increase of $143,000 in program revenue was somewhat offset by an increase in program expenses of nine percent, the treasurer said.

A total of $600,000 was spent on improvements with most of that amount going to camping facilities. Donations declined by $6,000.

"We've had a reasonably good year with a break-even budget for next year," Bornstein said. "We hope to be able to generate money from operations to cover improvements we're going to make." There was a slight decline – 2.7 percent – in membership fees which totalled $42,000.

Meeting chair Michael Kerbel, a former community centre president, reported that the BJC has 7,000 members.

Executive director Deborah Pinsky said a family resource centre, in combination with Jewish Family and Child Service, will be developed at Promenade Mall this year. This centre is a prelude to developing a BJC campus in York Region for members who live up north, she said.

The BJC will concentrate on camping, athletics and early childhood programs in the year to come.

New members elected to the board of directors were Allan S. Cheskes, Bernie Fishbein, Robert Furman, David Green, Fran Grudman, Michael Kerbel, Morris Berengut, Sid Cohen, Janet Durbin, Mark Lichtblau, Richard Pivnick, Ramneek Pooni and Mitchel Smith.

A plaque was presented to the outgoing president by the president-elect Bruce Leboff, while the volunteer award, presented by Helen Finder Guttman, went to Fishbein.

Planning underway for March 2000

TORONTO — Jordan Bohnen thought he knew what he was in for when he participated in the 1998 March of the Living. His expectations were totally wrong, the 18-year-old told a crowd of some 300 high school students and their parents recently.

Speaking at an information night held at Adath Israel Congregation, Bohnen, who had no family in Europe at the time of the Holocaust, said he expected to be taught that the Holocaust was the focal point of Jewish history and identity, and that organizers had hopes of influencing the participants to become more religious.

On Yom Hashoah, the day of the march from Auschwitz to Birkenau, under a sunny sky, it struck Bohnen that the 6,000 participants from around the world were "also celebrating life."

Holocaust survivors accompanying the trip to Poland and Israel urged students to look at how vibrant the prewar Polish Jewish community was, Bohnen said.

Although some participants initially found their everyday lives "trivial" on returning home, "in the end it was worth it," said Bohnen.

The program affords students an opportunity to be "active historians" as well as offering insight into their responsibilities as Jews and citizens of the world, said Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Board of Jewish Education, which will be supervising the march from now on.

There are 100 spots open to Toronto students in Grades 11, 12 and OAC for this year's trip, which runs from April 30 to May 14, 2000. The cost is $5050, and subsidies are available in cases of financial need. Such cases will be dealt with by a "discreet and proper system" rather than a big committee, said Barry Naiberg, MC for the evening, and this year's March of the Living co-chair.

The program is an emotional, intellectual and educational experience, said Naiberg.

It will now run annually instead of every other year, giving more students a chance to participate over a two-year period. In the past, 150 students went on one biennial trip. Most of the students will be chosen by lottery, with the exception of a few whose qualifications stand out, Naiberg explained.

"I believe it's a wonderful learning experience for young people," said Anita Ekstein, a former hidden child who accompanied the 1996 and 1998 trips. "It's not an easy trip. It's an emotional roller coaster."

Her role on the trip, she said, was to fill information gaps on subjects the guides didn't discuss, and to provide support. She likewise was supported by the participants, who, she said, gave her courage and strength.

A video of the 1998 march included a moving scene in which Ekstein introduced participants to her rescuer. The trip also included meetings with Polish youth, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

After a week in Israel culminating with Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, March of the Living participants returned home "tired but wiser, more understanding and appreciative of our families," said Ekstein.

The experience, which includes pre- and post-trip programming, will "in a sense, change their lives forever, and help them define themselves as decent human beings," said Lorraine Sandler, who will be leading the march, along with 20 other chaperones.

For students who are not accepted, Sandler noted that a similar trip, From Anguish to Hope, exists for university students.

The Jewish Agency's Cuban Connection

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), financially supported by the world-wide UJA Federation network, is continuing a dramatic year of rescue operations – this time in Cuba.

Over the past four years, 400 Jews have made aliyah through JAFI funding and another 200 have already completed the paperwork to leave with Canada as an intermediary. The Canadian Embassy in Havana has been transferring aliyah applications to the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa. The disclosure of Cuban Jewish aliyah through a Canadian diplomatic pipeline was revealed only last week.

The Jewish Agency, which has still not officially commented on the Cuban aliyah, has been involved in secret efforts to free Cuba's Jews for most of this decade. And, according to some reports, Israel and Cuba are interested in restoring diplomatic ties, broken after the Yom Kippur war.

The 600 Cuban Jews who have arrived or are on their way constitute about half of Cuba's Jewish community, which numbered about 15,000 before Fidel Castro's Communist revolution. "The Jews, most of whom had come from Europe, perceived very clearly the telling signs in Castro's rhetoric foreshadowing trouble," says Dr. Robert Levine in his publication, Counting Shadows: A Broader Look at Cuban Jewish History. Most of the Jewish population crossed the water to south Florida in the early '60s.

Although Cuba was an official atheist state until the early '90s when a new constitution changed Cuba's status to "secular," Havana's four synagogues are still functioning with government approval and Jews have not been prevented from religious practice. Since 1992, the American Joint Distribution Committee, a UJA Federation partner agency, has been caring for the physical and organizational needs of Cuban Jewry, with financial assistance from UJA Federation campaigns. In addition, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region has been distributing Kosher for Passover food products to members of Cuba's Jewish community since the 1960s.

Cuba is the latest location of intense Jewish Agency aliyah activity. Next month, rescue operations will resume to bring the remaining Ethiopian Jews from Quara to Israel and JAFI is still evacuating Jews from Dagestan, an impoverished republic in the former Soviet Union. There, Moslem fundamentalist rebels are trying to establish a political stronghold - in the process, threatening the security of Dagestan's Jewish population.

Jose Miller, (above) president of the Jewish Community House of Cuba, speaks to the press in Havana about the complex exodus from Cuba of 400 Jews which involved three foreign countries including Canada.

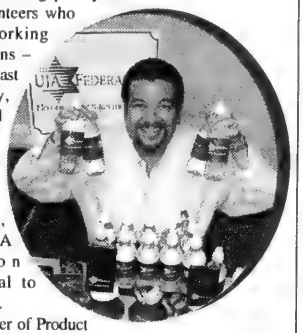
Prince of Prizes

Did someone say prizes? Just give Neil Benson a few hours and he'll make your gift wish come true.

A product promoter and UJA Federation volunteer, Benson is producing plenty of prizes for volunteers who have been working hard at telethons – especially this past Super Sunday, October 17, and all this week.



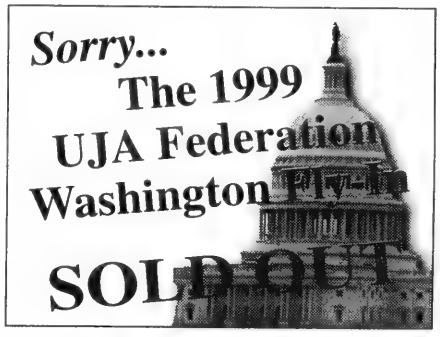
Super Sunday, alone, contributed well over $1 million, bringing the UJA Federation Campaign total to over $23 million.

Benson, owner of Product Marketing Ideas in Concord Ontario, is the man behind a big part of the fun at this week's telethons, acquiring donations of thousands of custom-made UJA Federation items and other unique rewards for telethon campaigners.

The buyer of bobbles, who traveled as far as St. Catharines to collect a wide array of give-aways, was pleased to see how many of his business contacts were willing donate everything from pens to yoyos to water bottles featuring UJA Federation labels. "I work with some real mensches."

"But it's a pretty easy sell when it comes to UJA Federation," says Benson, who didn't need much convincing himself when Dov Altman, who is co-chairing the telethons with Judy Engel and Rosanne Ain, called him up to ask for help. "Did I mention he's my first cousin?" he jests.

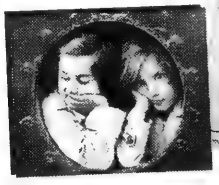
On a serious note, the father of two, whose involvement with UJA Federation was minimal until this year, says he's glad to have the opportunity to become more connected to the Jewish community. "It feels really good to do what I can to help an organization that helps so many."



Holocaust Education Week Begins

The city's spotlight will soon be on Holocaust education as the 19th annual Holocaust Education Week gets under way on October 28.

The largest program of its kind in North America is offering more events and venues than ever before .



Researchers found that there were a number of children among the St. Louis passengers, many of whom were eventually deported to concentration camps.

Though U.S. newspapers generally portrayed the plight of the passengers with great sympathy, only a few suggested that they be admitted into America.

The lessons of the Holocaust will be brought to life this year through more than 100 programs hosted by dozens of community organizations, including 36 churches.

For close to two decades, world renowned speakers, academics and performers participate in what has become known as North America's premier Holocaust Education program. Holocaust Education Week is coordinated by UJA Federation's Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre.

"Each year more and more groups and organizations, both Jewish and non-Jewish, ask to be involved as hosts and sponsors," says Howard Driman, who is co-chairing the 1999 Holocaust Education Week with Barbara Rusch. "The amount of interest in the event is a testament to the relevance and importance of the subject matter, as well as the mandate of the program."

The Voyage of the St. Louis which recalls the story of the ill-fated attempt by 900 German Jewish refugees to sail to freedom in Cuba as told by historian Scott Miller and Sarah Ogilvie, will open the 12 day line-up. Miller and Ogilvie will share their findings which trace the fate of almost all the passengers who were eventually sent to Europe on the eve of World War II.

Other highlights include Exploiting the Holocaust – Lessons from Kosovo featuring Major –General (ret'd) Lewis Mackenzie, War Criminals – 1999, featuring Madame Justice Louise Arbour, former Chief prosecutor of the United Nations International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia and Life is Beautiful – a debate and discussion about the Oscar-winning film by Roberto Benigni.

Joseph Burg

The photo set into this editorial is a single-image essay that stirs countless emotions, poignantly capturing the travail of responsibility. The year is 1955. The State of Israel is still in its early infancy. Enemies on all sides threaten the state from without. Poverty and economic hardship lash at the people from within. But the ingathering of hundreds of thousands of disparate exiles continues apace, even as the defence forces are being molded into a unified force and a new, exciting, difficult but dynamic society begins to emerge in the sanctuary called Israel.

In the photo, David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir and Joseph Burg are sitting on the government benches in the Knesset. Burg is the minister of social welfare. From their postures and their expressions, it appears they and/or their policies are being vilified by critics and ideological foes on the opposite side, competing for the public's support in their common struggle to build a new country and a just society where none had existed for 2,000 years.

Joseph Burg was quite familiar with the travail of responsibility. For nearly 40 consecutive years he served in the Knesset. A deputy speaker in the first Knesset, he joined the cabinet in the second Knesset, where he remained as a coalition partner, almost without interruption, until 1986.

Last week at his home in Jerusalem, Joseph Burg passed away. He was 90, the last of the three "giant" parliamentarians in the photo, and, alas, among the last of that unique, exceptionally strong generation of leaders who stepped courageously forward out of a terrible, black night of Holocaust to lead their people into the uncertain but translucent dawn of Hope.

Joseph Burg was a complex and accomplished man. He was an ordained rabbi, had a laser-sharp intellect, possessed a wide and eclectic scholarship, and spoke several languages fluently.

But even with the complexity of the man, there was one simple, unadorned and elegant truth embedded deeply in his soul. Burg loved the Jewish people, all of the Jewish people. All his life he strove in furtherance of that love.

Last year, near this time, CJN readers were privileged to be able to read Burg's personal reminiscence of Rosh Hashanah 1948. The following is an excerpt of that reminiscence.

"This Rosh Hashanah, 50 years after the founding of the State of Israel, demands intensive soul-searching, perhaps more than ever. I would suggest we always remember the precepts from the Sayings of the Fathers (3:1) and act accordingly. They are: the sense of history, the sense of direction and the sense of responsibility."

Burg's suggestion was true then; it is true today; it will ever be true.

One generation passes away but its values pass on to the next.

May the memory of Joseph Burg be for blessing.

Says book on his late wife contains errors

I am the husband of the late Ina McCarthy, the subject of a contentious book and subsequent book review (CJN, Sept. 23).

I must take umbrage with this review, which effectively takes a book at face value without acknowledging that it contains a variety of errors, omissions and half-truths. At no time through the years of her marriage was my late wife ever known as "Ina Swedler McCarthy." This is a fabrication of her parents and a nomenclature used without permission. Ina legally changed her name of her own volition and was proud to do so.

Statements such as "Swedler McCarthy left a young son Josh…" without an acknowledgment that she also left a husband who cared for her during her years of waning health, and who almost singlehandedly raised that son in the three years since her death, are callous, unthinking and insulting.

The book also makes use of numerous photographs protected by copyright to which I hold title, without permission, and violates the privacy of my son, using his name and image unlawfully and without my permission. The book has been a source of great embarrassment and harm to myself, my family, my new wife and her family.

Against Balkanization of Western Wall

Re: Opinions column on Kotel (CJN, Sept. 16): Since its liberation from Jordan in 1967, Jerusalem's Kotel Ma'aravi, or Western Wall, has been a spiritual magnet for Jews of all denominations and beliefs.

Critics of the non-traditional prayer groups regard the gatherings as essentially political manoeuvres, the opening of new fronts in the American non-Orthodox leaders' war against Israel's "religious status quo." (Indeed, the organizer of one mixed-gender Kotel prayer group inadvertently referred to the gathering as a "rally.")

They point out, moreover, that the vast majority of the Wall's regular visitors are Orthodox Jews. And that whatever one may personally think of mixed-gender services and chanting women, such things offend the Orthodox. Sensitive folk of good will, after all, would never think of entering a mosque with shoes on – or a closed space with a lit cigarette.

For more than three decades, the Kotel has been a place – perhaps the only one in the world – where Jews of all affiliations and persuasions have regularly prayed side by side.

Imagine, though, the realization of the activists' goal: a "Balkanized" Kotel, Orthodox Jews here, non-Orthodox there, never the twain to meet, or at least to stand together in prayer.

Could any truly caring Jew – of whatever prefix – really want to hammer that horrid, heavy nail into the coffin of Jewish unity?

Wants to pray with women at Kotel

Re: Kenneth Fisher (Prayers at Kotel, Oct. 7, CJN): I was brought up to believe, that all people have equal rights, black, white, Catholic, Jews, men or women. We were created in God's image. We are all His children. When we do wrong, it is up to God to judge.

It was a woman that gave birth to me; it is a woman that gave birth to my children. As a little boy, when I scraped my knee, it was my Yiddishe mama that made the pain go away. As a man, it is my wife that stands beside me when things go wrong and I am troubled.

When I pray, my thoughts are only on my prayers. Only a very weak person is distracted by sexuality. I hope that I can soon pray at the Wall, with the sweetest gift God gave me, a woman!

Says Jews did not control Iraqi economy

As an active member of the Iraqi Jewish community in Toronto, I would like to respond to the article "The Iraqi Jews of Toronto." (CJN, Sept. 30)

The statement, "We are the cream of the crop," is far from accurate. It is both condescending and objectionable. Just like with any other good citizens of this country, Jews or non-Jews, there are in the small Iraqi Jewish community in Toronto physicians, mechanics, lawyers, blue collar laborers, office workers, accountants, taxi drivers and teachers.

Further, there is no evidence in any research or document that the Iraqi Jews were most prosperous and influential, as reported in the article. The contrary was reported by the British Consulate in Baghdad just before World War I. The makeup in percentage was as follows: wealthy – five percent; middle-class – 30 percent; poor – 60 percent; beggars – five percent. This was not much different from the rest of the population. Some Iraqi Jews were prosperous and influential, and so were some Christians and many Muslims.

The statement, "We more or less controlled the economy of Iraq," is not true either. The Jews of Iraq contributed significantly to the economy of Iraq, but at no time did they control the economy of the country. The statement ignores completely the influence and the weight of the wealthy and powerful elite of the Muslim majority who were the real rulers of Iraq.

On the trail of Holocaust-looted art

By FERN SMILEY

Austria is in the midst of an inquiry into World War II art acquisitions in its national museums. A recently established commission is scrupulously poring over documents and archives to examine the trail of art during and after the Nazi Anschluss of 1938.

Simon Wiesenthal, speaking in Vienna in March, urged action in the area of recovery and restitution. This effort, seen as contrition – coming to terms with admission of complicity during the war years – is sweeping the art community in every country in the world, surprisingly even those countries outside the 12-year tenure of the Nazi Kunstraub or "spoilage."

Lordship Lane Station, Dulwich by Camille Pissarro.

In Austria's case, the inclination to disclose truth of ownership was not altogether altruistic. Like Switzerland, forced to admit its record of collaboration with Nazi gold, Austria was exposed as having a dreadful record of restitution especially as artwork was concerned. In addition, the acclaimed determination in Austria to restore art to Jewish heirs may be short-lived, as results of a recent claim may suggest.

Last month, in a stunning defeat for the claimants, the Beirat (advisory board to the commission on art restitution) advised the Austrian government to deny restitution of five Gustav Klimt oil paintings to the surviving heirs of Jewish sugar magnate, Ferdinand Bloch Bauer.

In London, prompted by a scathing report by historians of the Holocaust Educational Trust, the British government solidly fixed its will on the inspection of art in Britain's public collections. And in an alarming admission, the National Gallery in London recently admitted that more than 120 pieces of art in its inventory lacked records that could raise the art cleanly above suspicion of being confiscated or looted from Jewish owners during World War II. Since the release of the list, only 10 of its paintings have been cleared as free of Holocaust dealings.

London's Tate Museum is reeling from Britain's first heir/survivor claim, which involved a 19th-century view of Hampton Court painted by a Dutch master. It was documented as originating from a German Jewish collector shot by the Nazis in 1937.

At a recent seminar on Art, Law and the Holocaust, held at the Courtauld Gallery in London, Courtauld director John Murdoch identified several paintings in his gallery's collection that are now under investigation for holding scant or "dodgy" art ownership pedigrees.

Toronto art enthusiasts were able to get a firsthand look at one of these, Camille Pissarro's Lordship Lane Station, Dulwich, during the blockbuster visiting Courtauld Institute Exhibit at the Art Gallery of Ontario in the summer of 1998.

In Washington, the newly struck President's Commission on Holocaust Era Assets is mandated to provide the president with the full historical record of U.S. government participation in trade, collection and restitution of the possessions, especially art, looted from World War II victims. In the United States, the State Department Holocaust-era Assets Conference last December provided impetus for the political incentive to address the issue.

Publicity on the lack of due diligence in many art museums has affected the reputations of the finest institutions in the country, including the Museum of Modern Art in New York, the Seattle Art Museum and the Boston Museum of Fine Art. Now the commission will be obliged to look at all federal institutions and bequests therein, such as the Smithsonian and the National Gallery of Art. Federally funded private museums may also be scrutinized. At stake also are the contents and collections of federal buildings, military offices and embassies abroad.

In addition, in their pursuit of the accurate historical record, the historians and archivists will be canvassing the the art world in general with respect to art dealings during and after the Holocaust. This effort has begun to spawn important finds including the discovery of long-lost archival records that may affect interpretation of present day property laws.

Ironically, Israel has also been struggling with the issue of victims' claims, as the Israel Museum was recently alerted to a painting that originated from a European Jewish collector whose heirs are now requesting restitution. Pissarro's Boulevard Montmartre: Spring 1897 was put up for sale in 1935 at a forced "Jew Sale," according to documentation provided by the heir of Max Silberberg, a German Jewish industrialist killed by the Nazis.

In such a climate then, the question arises as to the stance taken by Canadian authorities on cultural property in this country's public holdings. While many countries were represented by heritage or museum officials, the Canadian government was not represented at the Art, Law and the Holocaust seminar.

Granted, Canada's collection does not compare in size or scope with those of Austria or the United States. No Canadian museum has suffered public embarrassment over devastating claims against a work of art – either one in a museum collection or one in a visiting exhibition in a Canadian institution – being brought forward by a Holocaust survivor or heir claiming legal title.

However, as Emily Pocock, the Australian speaker at the Art, Law and the Holocaust conference said, "States can learn from the experience of others, and it would be a mistake [for art galleries], to fail to recognize the continuing relevance of Nazi-looted art. After all, if it can happen in Dunedin, it can happen anywhere."

Do all paintings, sculptures, tapestries and fine art objects in Canadian museums purchased or bequeathed in the last 54 years withstand the scrutiny of art investigators who are not satisfied with missing gaps in provenance? Every collection is subject to investigation by journalists or researchers who uncover discrepancies in ownership histories.

As Boston Globe writer Walter Robinson single-handedly and effectively investigated the Museum of Fine Art in Boston, so will some student eventually focus on the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, the Art Gallery of Ontario in Toronto, or Ottawa's National Gallery. Even the Canadian military may yield some art holdings or décor of historical interest, since Allied soldiers were known to pilfer paintings and bring them to home countries as booty. The British messes are presently being scrutinized for holdings that were received in this manner.

Last December, a Canadian delegation attending the Washington Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets formally signed an 11-point voluntary agreement obligating each country to pursue actions that will yield access to archives, to publicize art of dubious provenance and resolve claims in a fair manner.

David Walden of Heritage Canada's cultural movable property branch, who attended the Dec. 4 signing, says that Canada's museum directors have been working on a document, but to date he has not received a final draft.

The museum directors operate as a private organization, unrelated to government, he explains. Therefore, there has not yet been a government response that will enable Canada to ensure the integrity of its public art museums and uphold the 11 principles. Indeed, each art institution takes its own approach to the issue, and only as budgets and personnel permit.

The Art Gallery of Ontario has struck an ad hoc committee to review the problems of spoils of war in general, but it has not yet determined the exact nature of the research or personnel required.

"Every country should be examining their own public collections, but especially a country like Canada with such strong ties to Great Britain," warns researcher Stephen Ward of London-based Holocaust Educational Trust.

Contested ownership of art works has already touched one Canadian institution. The 1998 dispute is over a Giorgio Vasari, a 16th-century Italian painter whose Marriage Feast of Cana hangs in the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. Although the claimant in this case is not an heir to Jewish victims of plunder, but rather the Budapest Fine Arts Museum, it nevertheless illuminates the problems facing all museums with respect to acquisitions.

The Canadian Jewish Congress has approached museum directors for guidelines under which the institutions will be prepared to act on questions about holdings and Holocaust-era acquisitions. The document being formulated by the Canadian Art Museums Directors organization addresses most of the concerns of restitution bodies in the United States. It lacks, however, a key element for the Jewish community – once a piece is identified as tainted, there is no mechanism for restitution unless a claimant comes forward. There may be priceless paintings identified that have no heirs surviving or informed enough about their ancestors' losses to bring claims forward.

Pissarro's Boulevard Montmartre, currently in the Israel Museum.

The pictures will survive; the memory of their Jewish owners during the Holocaust has already been erased. "Heirless works" such as these accentuate the need to reconstruct and remember the history of their unfortunate trail. With a Holocaust museum now under discussion in Ottawa, the government and art institutions have the ability to solve this issue. "Heirless works" could be exhibited in a section of the Canadian Holocaust museum, in a gallery dedicated to education and remembrance, a Canadian gallery of art lost during the Holocaust.

St. Louis survivors

Before the year 2000 rings in, I want to recall an anniversary of significance. Sixty years ago last spring a ship called the St. Louis left Germany with more than 900 refugees from the Nazis.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

All of them had visas for Cuba and they hoped to make a new life for themselves on that faraway island.

But when they arrived, full of hope and ready to take up a new life, they were informed that the Cuban government had cancelled all visas and that the St. Louis survivors would be turned away. Only a few who had severe health problems were allowed to disembark, and the rest were forced to continue a journey that has since been entered into the annals of sadness and infamy.

The most natural inclination of the captain of the ship was to land his passengers somewhere in Florida, but the U.S. Coast Guard prevented any such plan from being carried out. So the ship continued northward all the way to Canada and met with equally poor success. While Mackenzie King was shepherding visiting British royalty in Washington, he had no time to be bothered with almost 1,000 Jewish refugees.

On June 17, 1939, the trip of the St. Louis ended in Antwerp, Belgium. Ten weeks later Hitler invaded Poland and World War II began.

Since then, many stories have been told about the ship and its journey, but few have traced the exact whereabouts of the survivors, for there were some.

Recently, two researchers at the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, Sarah Ogilvie and Scott Miller, traced the fate of all 937 St. Louis passengers. They consulted deportation lists, memoir-books and other resources of Jewish organizations. It was easier, says Miller, to find the dead than the survivors, but in the end a reconstruction of that puzzle emerged.

Contrary to previous impressions, about half of the passengers did survive, says Ogilvie (according to a report in the German magazine Der Spiegel). Those who disembarked in France, Holland and Belgium, were caught by the Nazi war machine, but those who found refuge in England – even though they were dubbed "enemy aliens" – did survive, at least most of them.

About 100 of them are still alive, 85 in the United States, a few in Australia, South America and Israel. One lives in France, another in Holland and one has returned to Berlin, Germany. Only 23 names are still on the search list. The CJN reported on two survivors living in Canada in the article "Remember the St. Louis" on May 13, 1999. If you know a survivor who lives in Canada, I would like to hear from her/him.

Next time you are in Washington and visit the Holocaust museum you will find an illustrated exhibit entitled The Trip of the St. Louis. If you cannot make it to Washington by plane, train, or car, you might turn on your computer and look under www.ushmm.org.

Perhaps, by the time you read this, there will be additional news about some of the passengers who have been unaccounted for up to now.

Playing Jewish geography

So here I am. Back in the smoky room with the idle chatter and kosher snacks. The 1999-2000 schmoozing season has begun.

The Provinces Jewish Students Federation (APJSF) kicks off the year with their Booze and Schmooze event. Loud music, cheap alcohol and a room full of Jews.

Jennifer Fox on campus in Halifax

It's not what the APJSF does that makes it an interesting group (though their work does make it an important one), but who makes up the organization. The players are different than the typical Jewish student organizations found at McGill or Western.

Two distinct groups make up the APJSF – home and away. Home students are those who reside in Halifax (and surrounding area), as well as all students who hail from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Jewish students from Newfoundland are too few and far between to count as part of the home team. Plus, their flights to the Rock take as long as to Ontario.

Through a process of elimination, the away team is comprised of students not from the three Maritime provinces. Within this category is a very large sub-category – the Torontonians. Or, like myself, those who live close enough to Toronto to declare themselves members of the mega-city. I'll admit it. Saying I'm a Thornhiller sounds silly.

This year, the University of King's College, my quaint little school, finds more Jewish students in attendance than ever before. Not surprisingly, most Jews are from the big T.O. This isn't very different from the demographics of the general King's population, which has a large Toronto contingent.

We, from the most hated city in Canada, are not so affectionately referred to as Upper Canadians. I would like to state for the record that I am not an Upper Canadian. My background isn't British. My parents weren't even born in Ontario. My family wasn't even on this continent the last time Upper Canada existed. It's not as if I go around calling them Acadians.

Back to the Jewish population.

Do the home team members of the APJSF roll their eyes at the 416/905 (the area codes for the Greater Toronto Area – GTA) references? Are they sick of the exclusionary games of Jewish geography that start with "what school did you go to" and end with "do you know so-and-so?" I hope not.

It's not as dire as all that. There isn't an uncrossable gap between those raised in the Atlantic and Eastern time zones. Many students who come from away are already exposed to Halifax whether through relatives or camp. Camp Kadimah has a large non-Atlantic enrolment of campers and counsellors.

There are slight differences. The unrealistic expectations we bring East with us. I moan the loss of good bagels and Jewish deli. I find it endearing that the two Halifax synagogues (which are down the street from each other) are referred to as the Beth and the Shar. Possibly two dozen or so Toronto synagogues would fit under those headings.

More and more young Jews are leaving the comfort and familiarity of the GTA. They hop on a plane or a train and settle in Halifax. There's poetic justice in this. For so many years, the Halifax Jewish community lost its members to Toronto. Now they're enticing some of the away team to switch sides and join them.

The hope is that what started as four years at one of Nova Scotia's institutions of higher learning will become a lifelong devotion to the city of Halifax and its Jewish community. There will be no more home and away. No more us versus them. Only Jews sitting down to a beer in a city they love.

New rabbi in town

There were only two vacant seats in row L of the women's section in synagogue last Shabbat. And on the other side of the mechitzah, I noticed the pews becoming increasingly full.

I listened attentively to the confident and soothing voice of the cantor and the mesmerizing tunes of the choir. At times, my mind would drift with the sound of their voices and the most serene image of summer camp in the fall, with the leaves turning colors, an assertive blue sky and green grass finely cut would subconsciously put a smile on my face. Then suddenly, the rustling of papers and bodies standing as the ark was opened would startle me.

Erica Horn on campus in Montreal

As I joined the congregation and clergy in prayer, my eyes scanned both sides of the mechitzah, noticing the individuals who had chosen to come to synagogue that morning. I was not shocked by my observations, but rather frightened.

The age of the congregation appeared polarized, belonging either to my parents' generation and older (Ma, I'm not implying that you are old) or under the age of 10. Those under the age of 10 weren't actually in the sanctuary, but I had heard and seen them upon entering the synagogue. They are the welcoming committee and then they are responsible for the entertainment in the washrooms.

Realizing that I was one of maybe three young adults in shul, I began to think that the energy of our new, young rabbi might be going to waste until more college-aged students could be attracted to Saturday morning services and other programs organized by the synagogue. In my opinion, despite a certain stigma often associated with my shul, hiring a younger and dynamic rabbi could very well be the first step to encouraging a potential rebirth of synagogue attendance among members of my age cohort.

Having commenced in August, Rabbi Barry Gelman has thus far shown interest in our unique Montreal Jewish community, the vibrancy of the Jewish youth here and the constant improvement of the synagogue. For example, he agreed to hang and talk with students at Sukkahstock (an activity organized for CEGEP students in celebration of Sukkot), and to teach a woman's beit midrash class at Hillel.

I was most impressed by a sermon he gave one Saturday morning on domestic violence. It remains undisputed that shalom bayit or peace in the home is a key tenet of Judaism. However, it is seldom a topic for discussion because people are too afraid to deal with its harsh realities. The rabbi, after stating a few statistics, boldly asserted that domestic violence would not be tolerated in our community, no matter how influential and generous a person might be with his cheque-book or his time. In fact, the rabbi went so far as to say that any individual guilty of such crimes would and should be publicly embarrassed.

The synagogue fell silent. It then became clear to me how valuable the lessons we learn in synagogue are. Admittedly, many of the things we pray for do not relate to our modern lives in Canada, such as praying for rain on Shemini Atzeret (lately, we seem to be receiving enough of it without having asked for it). That should not stop us from attending synagogue.

For those within walking distance from the Shaar Hashomayim, I encourage you to come and see what our new rabbi is all about. I implore you to come listen to at least one of his sermons. They are not overly philosophical or complicated. The diction is simple, the message direct, and well within the framework of our religion.

I hope to see many of my peers this coming Saturday. Oh, and I almost forgot, he hands out candies after services – for those of you with a sweet tooth that should be sufficient to get you out of bed!

The Kirshner File

Lithuania, the Holocaust and war criminals

For better or worse, Lithuania has been in the forefront of Jewish history for hundreds of years.

On the positive side, the Jews of Lithuania, known as the Litvaks, were instrumental in the formation of three seminal movements: the Enlightenment (Haskalah), modern Zionism and the Jewish Labor Bund.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On the flip side, Lithuania summons up baneful memories. The Holocaust began in Lithuania with the first mass murders of Jews, a process in which local collaborators were complicit. The participation of Lithuanians in the Holocaust may well have contributed to the fact that approximately 94 percent of Lithuanian Jewry was decimated, possibly the highest murder rate sustained by Jews in Nazi-occupied Europe.

In recent years, Lithuania, a Soviet republic until its declaration of independence in 1991, has had to relive those terrible years.

First, Lithuania has been tarred by reports that it wilfully pardoned war criminals.

Second, Lithuania has been accused of failing to come to terms with its past.

After breaking away from the Soviet Union, Lithuania issued certificates of exoneration to about 50,000 Lithuanians whom Soviet courts had branded as war criminals. Among those pardoned were Lithuanian nationals who had taken part in the slaughter of Jews.

When protests reached Vilnius, the government responded by denying rehabilitation to 1,000 individuals and by revoking some pardons. But then the New York Times reported that Lithuania had begun to exonerate war criminals yet again. The Lithuanian Supreme Court suspended rehabilitations and Lithuania's president promised to conduct a thorough investigation.

Lithuania appears to have kept its promise. "The rehabilitations have fundamentally been stopped," said Sol Littman, the Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, in a recent interview.

Two years ago, Ephraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's office in Israel, lashed out at Lithuania by suggesting that it had not honestly tried to confront its role in the Holocaust. As he put it in a piece in the Jerusalem Post: "Not a single Nazi war criminal has ever been indicted, let alone, convicted, in independent Lithuania."

Shortly after his article appeared, Lithuania's prosecutor general indicted Kazys Gimzauskas for his alleged role in the murder of Lithuanian Jews. A former member of the Lithuanian Auxiliary Police (Saugumas), he was stripped of his American citizenship and, subsequently, he fled to Lithuania.

Several months later, Lithuania announced that Aleksandras Lileikis, who had worked under Gimzauskas, would be put on trial. Like Gimzauskas, he took up residence in Lithuania after being stripped of his U.S. citizenship.

Lileikis' trial, which had been scheduled to begin in the winter of 1998, has been postponed three times because of his poor health. On Sept. 13, his trial was adjourned indefinitely.

Last year, Lithuania established an international commission to examine war crimes committed on its soil. Its co-chairman, Emanuelis Zingeris, is the only Jewish member of Lithuania's Parliament.

Yet Lithuania's efforts to come clean fall short as far as Israel's ambassador to Lithuania and Zuroff are concerned.

Sara Ginaite

The envoy, Oded Ben-Hur, who is based in Latvia, caused an uproar last summer by saying that Lithuania has a poor record in prosecuting suspected war criminals. Ben-Hur, who leveled a similar accusation in 1997, claimed that Lithuania might not be able to integrate itself into the new Europe if it dragged its feet on war crimes prosecutions and failed to publicly acknowledge the guilt of some of its citizens.

At around the same time, Zuroff said that the Lithuanian government has ignored the presence of eight war criminals living in Lithuania. As a result, he noted, Lithuania has become "the biggest Nazi haven in Europe."

Lithuania has also ruffled feathers by investigating Jews suspected of committing crimes in Lithuania while in the employ of the Soviet secret police before and after World War II.

One such case concerns Julius Slavins, who settled in Kaunas (Kovno) after his family left Germany following Hitler's accession to power. Now a resident of Bonn, Germany, Slavins joined the KGB in the wake of Germany's invasion of the Soviet Union. After Lithuania became independent, two men signed affidavits charging Slavins with having brutally interrogated them and having signed papers sentencing them to prison terms in Siberia. Lithuania accused Slavins of genocide, and now demands his extradition.

Nationalist Lithuanians, Littman said, seek "equity" in the prosecution of war criminals. In a memo, Littman writes: "They (insist) that the Jewish demand for the prosecution of Lithuanian war criminals be equalized by the prosecution of Jewish KGB agents who, they say, were responsible for shipping thousands of Lithuanian citizens to Siberia from 1940 to 1944."

Littman rejects the parallelism.

"The cry for equity is essentially hypocritical and an ill-designed effort to avoid the guilt Lithuanians should feel for the active part many of them took in the destruction of Lithuanian Jewry."

He makes two points. The majority of KBG agents in Lithuania were not Jewish. Jewish membership in the KGB did not exceed the proportion of Jews in pre-war Lithuania. In 1939, Lithuania was home to 240,000 Jews. The figure has dwindled to 6,000 Jews today.

Sara Ginaite, a Kaunas-born Jewish economist and historian who has lived in Canada since 1983, believes that the Holocaust has widened divisions between Lithuanians and Jews.

During the Soviet era, the Holocaust was hushed up in Lithuania, observed Ginaite, a wartime partisan who has written two books about Lithuanian Jewry, The Beginning of the Tragedy of the Jews in Lithuania and A Book of Remembrance: the Jewish Community of Kaunas 1941-1944.

Throughout the post-war period, Lithuanian émigrés claimed that Lithuanians had killed Jews because they had collaborated with the Soviet Union and thus betrayed Lithuania.

In contemporary Lithuania, a more balanced approach has been adopted by such historians as Liudas Truska and Valentinas Brandisauskas, she disclosed.

A cautious person, Ginaite is careful not to condemn Lithuanians en masse. "I don't want to say that Lithuanians are murderers," she said. But evidence exists that Lithuanian policemen rounded up Jews at the behest of the Germans, and that Lithuania's provisional government turned a blind eye to the wholesale massacre of Jews starting in June 1941.

"From early on, Germans were joined by Lithuanian partisans who, in some instances, organized anti-Jewish pogroms on their own. Influenced by Nazi propaganda of equating Jews with Bolshevism, these collaborators in genocide were also motivated by native anti-Semitism, nationalist sentiment and personal motives of greed and revenge. Resentful of Jewish pro-Soviet manifestations while Lithuania was occupied by the Soviets in 1940, Lithuanians remained generally insensitive to the Nazi prosecution of Jews."

Due to such sentiments, she said, the first mass killings of Jews in Lithuania took place in the summer of 1941, aided and abetted by Lithuanians.

Don't wait to interview relatives

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

"[A] knowledge of one's grandfathers is an excellent introduction to history." – Maurice Samuels.

It is a truism of family history research that you can visit libraries and archives any time you like, either now or next year, but you should not delay interviewing elderly relatives about your family history.

The greatest regret of many genealogists is that they didn't ask the right questions of the right people at the right time. Tombstones often have stories to tell, but they're not nearly as articulate as living people.

Your first choice in conducting family interviews is to determine the right subject. Not everyone will be a fount of knowledge on family matters. The ideal subject is a raconteur with a sharp and honest memory, who is old enough to remember important family events of long ago.

Effective oral history cannot be produced by asking questions on the spur of the moment, without forethought. Prepare for the interview by devising a list of questions.

Here are 10 sample areas of questioning, suitable for a relative born in the Old Country:

1. What towns did the family come from in Europe? What do you remember of your life in these places?
2. Please tell something about your parents, grandparents and great-grandparents. (Try to establish time and place of births, marriages, deaths, etc.)
3. Who came from Europe to Canada? In what order?
4. Why did they leave?
5. When and how did they get here? If by ship, what do you remember of the voyage?
6. On what vessel did they come? Where did the ship dock?
7. Who was the first person in the family to come to Canada/America?
8. Where did family members settle in Canada/America? In what cities and on what streets?
9. Did contact continue with relatives in the Old Country? With whom and for how long?
10. Can you tell or show any stories, traditions, observances, recipes, photos, documents or other objects from the Old Country?

Other lists of questions, in greater detail, may be found in the useful book Record and Remember: Tracing Your Roots Through Oral History, by Ellen Robinson Epstein and Rona Mendelsohn. Another good sourcebook for doing oral histories is the classic text on Jewish genealogy, From Generation to Generation, by Arthur Kurzweil.

When interviewing an elderly relative who seems to possess much valuable information, don't tire out your subject by attempting to ask all your questions in one visit. Talk for an hour or so; then arrange to come back another day.

Also, try to be a good listener; let your subject talk. Don't interrupt a good story by asking for minor details that can be discovered later.

A technological tip: check the tape recorder intermittently. Too many interviews are lost because a tape jams, an incorrect button is pushed, a microphone connection is faulty, or the batteries go dead.

Epstein and Mendelsohn write that a grandchild often does an excellent job of interviewing an elderly person because of the natural rapport between them. But they warn that parents "can never be completely candid" with their own children because there are always outstanding parent-child issues between them.

"We know of a 68-year-old woman who lives with her 92-year-old mother," they write. "The mother is still complaining bitterly about her daughter's sloppiness and refusal to pick up the clothes in her room. It is very difficult for parents to see children as adults – at any age."

Even so, if you have an inclination to interview a parent about your family history, my advice is to do it immediately. Don't wait.

"Why didn't I ask him (or her) that question while I had the chance?" is a sad but common refrain among genealogists.

Remembering Reb Shlomo

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On the 16th day of Cheshvan, 5755, the Jewish world lost one of its most famous storytellers, singers and rabbis. Next Monday night marks the fifth yahrzeit of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, who has left a rich tapestry of story, inspiration and joyous songs. Today, Rabbi Carlebach's legacy.

After you visit a few sites dedicated to "Reb Shlomo," you begin to feel the powerful sense of community and caring the man instilled. Click on a page called Our Rebbe's Most Humble Abode and you are greeted by a picture of the rabbi and this message: "Where in the world are you now and where have you been?? I am so overjoyed to see you!!" [http://www.shamash.org/judaica/rebshlomo/].

This large site has links to Rabbi Carlebach's writings and teachings and to the charitable institutions he founded. There are also many moving eulogies to Rabbi Carlebach from strangers, friends, colleagues and Rabbi Yisroel Meir Lau, chief rabbi of Israel [gopher://shamash.org/hh/judaica/rebshlomo/hesped/]. For a comprehensive biography, see [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/reb-shlomo/log9611] and the New York Times obituary [http://www.shamash.org/listarchives/jewish-music/941027].

The Carlebach community stretches around the world with synagogues and minyanim where followers of the rabbi can feel at home [http://www.shamash.org/judaica/rebshlomo/crash.html]. Eventually, many followers find themselves at Congregation Kehilath Jacob, better known as The Carlebach Shul [http://www.shamash.org/judaica/rebshlomo/shul/mission.html]. The synagogue has been a New York institution for over 50 years. Rabbi Naphtali Carlebach assumed leadership of the synagogue in 1950. After his death in 1967, it was led by Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and his twin brother Rabbi Eli Chayim Carlebach. After their death, the congregation continued under Rabbi Shmuel Chayim Intrator.

For an early insight into the Carlebach family and rabbinic dynasty, I recommend the memoir written by Rabbi Eli Chayim Carlebach [gopher://shamash.org:70/00/judaica/rebshlomo/rebec.txt]. Even from an early age, everyone knew there was something special about Shlomo. He excelled intellectually but it was his neshamah, his soul, and his love for others that made him remarkable.

If you have a story to share or a feeling to express, you can join the Reb-Shlomo e-mail list. To subscribe, go to [http://www.shamash.org/help/listoflists.html]. To view the Reb-Shlomo archives back to 1995, go to [http://shamash.org/listarchives/reb-shlomo].

The most stirring article I came across appeared last year in the Jerusalem Post to mark the rabbi's fourth yahrzeit [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/11.Oct.1998/Opinion/Article-3.html]. In Missing Reb Shlomo, David Weinberg examines the irony that the unconventional Rabbi Carlebach only truly gained true respect and acceptance after his death.

"So misunderstood and unappreciated in his lifetime, yet so celebrated and yearned for after death – such was Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach. Who else was prepared to foray into the ashrams, hippie villages and pubs of the 1960s flower-child generation, showering love and acceptance of all? Only Reb Shlomo."

Recovering Sephardi assets

BY AVI BENLOLO

When I first met Leon Levy last spring, I realized the Sephardi world is headed toward an historical event that would impact on its past and its future. Levy, the national president of the American Sephardi Federation (ASF) is spearheading an initiative to register assets lost when Jews left Arab countries 50 years ago.

An ASF document explains the purpose of this registry is to compile a comprehensive data bank of this important historical information that will be available for researchers, scholars, and descendants for generations to come.

However, it is widely understood that the real use of the registry is to offset Palestinian refugee compensation claims. The list will serve as a counter-claim in the final status talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

In fact, ASF has the full backing of the Israeli government since it is widely known the Palestinians have been compiling their own refugee claims registry for some time.

The registry affects Jews who left countries like Algeria, Egypt, Libya, Yemen, Iraq, Morocco, Lebanon, Tunisia and Syria– leaving behind businesses, homes, bank accounts, and jewelry. Even communal property, like synagogues, schools and hospitals are included in the registry. Estimates of the worth of these assets range in the tens of billions of dollars.

For example, on March 10, 1951, the Iraqi Parliament legislated the confiscation of property of Jews who had renounced their citizenship so that they could immigrate to Israel. This law came exactly one year after the same Parliament passed a law allowing Iraqi Jews to sell their property and make aliya. The net result was that thousands of well-off Iraqi Jews came to Israel penniless.

As a result, ASF and the World Jewish Congress joined to form the International Committee of Jews from Arab Lands. They were charged with disseminating to communities questionnaires in order to quantify the losses.

In fact, some Sephardim began working on restitution for their lost property in 1975 (and prior) with the birth of the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries. But this effort is widely criticized as not having had the backing of the Israeli government. Perhaps the issue was not as pressing as it is now.

It is quite apparent, however, that this effort would be disconcerting to at least some Sephardim who may feel Israel is settling with the Palestinians at their expense and entitlement to their inheritance. In the end, they come out as losers.

But is it realistic to believe that Third World countries headed by figures like Muammar Qaddafi and Saddam Hussein would ever compensate Jews? Perhaps they will in the future, as nations are forced by leading countries to become more accountable for inhumane actions.

Arab nations, who have been lobbying for Israel to compensate Palestinian refugees for their losses, should also be held accountable for the loss of Jewish property.

Intellectual history

God's Funeral, The Decline of Faith in Western Civilization*, by A.N. Wilson (Norton, $42).

Books
Bernard Baskin

For a century and a half, starting about 1750, England experienced an unprecedented surge of scientific discovery and technological innovation. It was also a time of fierce theological debate and religious dissension. Philosophers, scientists, historians and eminent literary figures vigorously questioned the notion of God and the truth and major dogmas of Christianity.

Charles Darwin's On the Origin of Species (1859) caused a furor. It destroyed the central religious position that all beautiful and ingenious contrivances in nature were the benevolent design of an Almighty Clockmaker. They were, he argued, the operation of natural selection – the struggle for life that preserved random hereditary varieties. Moreover, he argued, it was obvious that human beings were descended from lower forms of life.

The great debate around Darwin was perhaps climaxed in the famous confrontation (1860) between T.H. Huxley (Darwin's bulldog) and Bishop Sam (soapy) Wilberforce. The bishop asked Huxley, "Was it through his grandfather or grandmother that he claimed his descent from a monkey?" Huxley retorted that he would prefer to have an ape for a grandfather than a man "possessed of great means and influence, who used his influence to bring scientific discussion into ridicule."

Darwinism, incidentally, was more readily accepted by the Church in England than it was by the rigid Protestant sects of the New World, a pattern that is maintained by the almost complete absence of present-day controversy over evolution in Great Britain, in contrast to the continuing clashes between fundamentalists and secular authority in the United States.

Earlier, the upsurge of geology, especially the work of Charles Lyell, fostered anti-biblical notions, such as the immense age and gradual development of the Earth. Investigations of life processes, inexorably cutting away the shroud of mystery that had singled out life as something outside Newton's mechanistic universe, were deeply troubling to people of faith.

In this perceptive work of intellectual history, the author provides biographical sketches not only of the major figures in the protracted struggle between religion and its opponents, between faith and doubt, but also of a variety of lesser-known, half-forgotten figures. Among them was Charles Bradlaugh, an impassioned professional atheist, who was elected five times to Parliament by his constituency. He refused to take the traditional religious oath and was refused his seat. After five years of heated controversy and debate, he was permitted, at last, to sit legally in the House of Commons.

Wilson makes few references to Jews or Judaism. He relates an anecdote about Martha Freud, Sigmund's wife of half a century, who once explained to a visitor, "You must know that on Friday evenings good Jewish women light candles for the approach of the Sabbath. But this monster – Unmensch – will not allow this, because he says that religion is a superstition."

In The Future of an Illusion (1927), Freud's most sustained attack on religion, he singles out his own people for particular mockery. "They have been egotistical enough to want to make themselves not just believers, but God's own special child, his chosen people."

Karl Marx, the author submits, was a "self-hating anti-Semite." That is why he could write, "Money is the jealous god of Israel before whom no other god may exist," and "the God of the Jews has been secularized and become the God of the world."

Wilson concludes that if the 19th-century anti-religionists were to return to earth today they would be astonished by the extent to which religion survives. "Though the influence of religion has undoubtedly diminished, the God idea has not been discarded with anything like the readiness which the Victorians would have predicted."

God's Funeral (the title comes from a poem by Thomas Hardy) is unfailingly informative, rich in insight and anecdote. It is a work that illuminates not just the religious doubts and uncertainties of a previous century, but also something of the prevailing sense of instability and loss of conviction that extends into our own troubled age.

Largest Holocaust Education Week set to begin Oct. 28

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Organizers are busy putting final touches to the community's 19th annual Holocaust Education Week, which runs Oct. 28 to Nov. 9.

This will be the largest Holocaust Education Week ever, with 110 programs, 36 participating churches, displays in 22 Toronto-area bookstores and a wide array of speakers, academics and performers.

Toronto city council has proclaimed the period to be Holocaust Education Week, and the councils of Vaughan, Richmond Hill, Markham and Mississauga have all endorsed the program.

'Nothing like this anywhere else'

"It's gratifying that so many people want to be part of it," says the program's co-chair, Howard Driman. "There's really nothing like this anywhere else."

The 12 days kick off at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill with a program to mark the 60th anniversary of the voyage of the St. Louis, the ill-fated ship that carried Jewish refugees fleeing Hitler's Europe, only to be refused entry by several nations, including Canada.

The luxury liner, whose destination was Cuba, returned to Europe on the eve of World War II. An estimated half of its 937 passengers eventually perished at the hands of the Nazis and their collaborators.

The evening will feature Scott Miller and Sarah Ogilvie, research historians at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, who are attempting to trace the fate of all the passengers who were aboard the St. Louis.

Other highlights will include lectures from Lewis Mackenzie, the Canadian former commander of UN peacekeeping forces in Bosnia, who will speak Nov. 1 on Exploiting the Holocaust – Lessons from Kosovo; Louise Arbour, recently appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada and the former chief prosecutor of the UN's war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, who will speak Oct. 29 on modern-day war criminals; and Ron Rosenbaum, author of the widely-acclaimed book Explaining Hitler: The Search for the Origins of his Evil, who is slated to speak Nov. 8.

Barbara Rusch, the program's co-chair, says she's particularly proud of the emphasis on the arts this year.

Indeed, the event will feature many films, performances and artistic impressions.

One of them will showcase Margaret Buss, an accomplished actor known for her one-woman productions, in a dramatization of the life of Miep Gies, who protected Anne Frank and her family (Oct. 31 and Nov. 1).

Toronto's Goethe Institute will present an evening of music by Jewish composers, the playing of which was strictly forbidden in Nazi Germany (Oct. 31).

A related program will take place Nov. 7 at Beth Emeth Synagogue on Jewish musicians in Nazi Germany, led by Prof. Michael Kater of York University.

Holocaust survivors, including former hidden children, are an important part of the program, and their recollections will be interspersed throughout the 12 days.

Other highlights:

• Prof. Michael Bar-Zohar, official biographer of David Ben-Gurion, will speak on the Jewish community of Palestine's efforts to rescue European Jews from the Holocaust (Nov. 1, 8 p.m., 272 Codsell Ave.)

• Betty Jean Lifton, a New York author and psychologist, will deliver a talk on Janusz Korczak, the renowned doctor who refused to abandon Jewish orphans in the Warsaw Ghetto (Nov. 1, 8 p.m., 2 Simonston Blvd., Thornhill).

• Prof. Michael Marrus of the University of Toronto will explore the question of how the murder of European Jews was communicated to the outside world; how, when and by whom it was received; and how it was interpreted (Nov. 2, Holy Blossom Temple, 8 p.m.).

• Also on Nov. 2, Prof. Sara Horowitz, director of the Jewish Studies program at the University of Delaware, will discuss women's memoirs of the Nazi years (8 p.m., 4700 Bathurst St.).

• Sybil Milton, a former senior historian at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, will deliver two talks, one on the economic crimes and consequences of the Holocaust (Nov. 3, 8 p.m. at Pride of Israel Synagogue), and the other on photography of the Holocaust as historical evidence (Nov. 4, 8 p.m., Beth Sholom Synagogue).

The closing program, Nov. 9 at Beth Tzedec Congregation, will feature a debate and discussion on the Academy Award winning film Life is Beautiful, featuring two leading American experts.

There will also be three days of pre-Holocaust Education Week programs, and two days of events following.

JWI set to honor breast cancer survivor

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Carol Ann Cole, then a two-year breast-cancer survivor, saw pewter "worry hearts" in a Nova Scotia gift store in 1994, she never dreamed that these hearts would lead to an initiative that, to date, has raised $800,000 for cancer research.

Cole, 53, Jewish Women International of Toronto's 1999 Woman of the Year, had lost her mother to the disease just 11 months after they had both been diagnosed.

She saw the hearts – designed to soothe the holder during stressful times – and bought 25 to pass out to cancer patients to hold while receiving treatments. She eventually gave away 117 hearts.

Her idea was so successful, she took early retirement from her executive position at Bell Canada, and sold the hearts full time to raise funds for breast-cancer research.

"I convinced the local manufacturer, Oceanart Pewter, to change the name of the hearts to Comfort Hearts, repackage them, dedicate the project to my mother, and earmark the proceeds to cancer research, and they said 'yes.'

"The Comfort Heart initiative was born. It turned out that the owner's sister was a cancer survivor," says Cole.

The hearts, which are impressed with a thumbprint, sell for $10 – $6 goes to research.

"When someone rubs that thumbprint, it gives them comfort and hope, and serves as a constant reminder that they are not alone.

"They can think of the person that gave them the heart, or of the people to whom they've given other hearts. I send a note with each heart ordered, so there is a personal touch to it.

"If I know someone is having a treatment, or needs a morale boost, I tell them that I'll give my own comfort heart a rub; it helps emit positive feelings.

"There is a lot of power in positive thinking. People dwell too much on the negative. They are happier if they can force themselves to focus on positive thoughts.

It's natural to have a pity party, but people have to eventually think positively. It makes the ordeal a lot easier."

Comfort Hearts, she says, are "one small way to join together in the struggle against cancer and other challenges by gaining strength from each other."

Carol Ann Cole

The hearts can be worn on a chain or ribbon around the neck, or can be used as a keychain. They can also be engraved to commemorate a special occasion.

Cole, who in 1998 received the Canadian Cancer Society's The Terry Fox Citation of Honor, and was listed on Maclean's (magazine) honor roll of 12 outstanding Canadians, has also won the Women of Distinction Award from the Halifax YWCA.

"When I was told that I was being honored by Jewish Women International, I felt quite humbled. It is an honor that they have reached out beyond the Jewish community," she says.

Cole will receive the award at the organization's 43rd annual Covenant Breakfast, to be held Oct. 31 at the Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre Hotel. Covenant Breakfast chair is Emma Lieberman.

Compensation rejected

were considering a class action lawsuit against Hermann Goering Werke and its successor, Zalzinger AG, which still operates a steel mill in Germany. But the plan came to naught, mainly because the firm has no assets in Canada.

Chandler drew a clear distinction between forced and slave laborers. He said the former were often non-Jews – locals who were rounded up to work farms and to repair infrastructure. Slave labor was comprised mostly of Jews, who were kept as virtual captives and subjected to horrific conditions.

Michael Witti, the Munich lawyer acting for some claimants, vowed that the negotiations would continue until there was an acceptable settlement.

He reiterated his demand for at least $10 billion.

Mel Weiss, a lawyer who represented American survivors, called the offer "shameful" and "a pittance."

The offer "amounts to about $300 million or less in 1940 terms," he said.

"I told the German delegation they have done more harm to the German government and German people than they can ever imagine," Weiss added.

Lawyers representing the plaintiffs had sought an amount in the range of $20 billion – any less, they said, would be insulting.

German officials have called the figure of $20 billion "very far removed from reality."

On the day after the offer was tabled, despite the insistences that the offer was final, the German government announced that further negotiations for the compensation of one-time slave laborers would continue in Bonn Nov. 16 and 17.

Agreement has been reached, however, on one component of a settlement considered important to Jewish groups.

The German companies and the government agreed to draft a letter or statement of moral responsibility that would be sent out with payments from the fund, officials said.

Holy Blossom preschool principal to pursue 'dream'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Lorraine Sandler

TORONTO — After 18 years at Holy Blossom Temple Preschool, 17 of them as principal, Lorraine Sandler is channeling her energies elsewhere.

"I am definitely not retiring. I just thought that my chai year was an appropriate time to [leave the school] and pursue my dream."

That dream, says Sandler, is to put together a four-pronged project that will be piloted in two cities. "We will look at curriculum, teacher education, Israel education for teachers and students, and Jewish family education. All these things have to come together for a full spectrum of identity."

She is seeking a foundation to underwrite the project, which is now in the planning stages.

While principal, Sandler says, some ideas had been "fermenting about how vital it is to bring Jewish children into a Jewish educational environment.

"At the same time, [it is necessary] to reach the parents who may not be predisposed to thinking consciously about Jewish education for their children. We want them to embrace Jewish education, and Jewish life, practice and learning for themselves as well."

Early childhood education is a real entry point into Jewish identity, says Sandler. "The children come home with good feelings, and they are able to transmit that joy to their parents, who pick up on it and carry it through into their homes.

"It is very special when these feelings are ignited. We've seen wonderful things happen, such as an increase in temple membership, and parents who are inspired to put their children into Hebrew day school. This has come from watching children learn joyously."

As well, Sandler is running professional development programs for teachers. "I have witnessed how teachers become activated when they are inspired by the importance of their role. In many cases, teachers are caring and loving, but they have vast gaps in their own Jewish education. Teachers have to be secure in their own identity in order to inspire that identity in others. I can see the project realizing that goal."

Sandler, 57, whose husband Alan is president of UJA Federation, has been Federation's chair of continuity and the Israel experience, and is chairing this year's March of the Living. "Everything I want to do requires me to have a lot of energy, so I made the change while I was still young and energetic. I feel people have to know when it's time to let go."

She is leaving the school, she says, with a great feeling of accomplishment. "It has grown from 45 to 172 students, and I believe that I've helped change the face of early childhood education in the city, by setting high standards, and involving the children in a real sense of Jewish life.

Pam Hamovitch, current principal of Holy Blossom Temple Preschool, says that while Sandler was at the school, she brought in a program called Seeing the World through Jewish Eyes. "That has formed the basis for much of our programming. Values such as tzedakah and mitzvot are prevalent on a day-to day basis."

Sandler also had students sing for the residents of Baycrest Centre. Part of the tzedakah money collected went to buy flowers for the residents. "This way, the children actually saw where their tzedakah was going," says Hamovitch.

An endowment fund is being established in Sandler's name to help accommodate children with special needs into preschool.

In her honor, a family fun day featuring entertainment and refreshments will be held on Oct. 24.

Cancer walkathon to honor Toronto teen

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 200 friends and family members will walk for cancer in memory of an 18-year-old who died last summer.

The Polly K. Walk for Cancer, a fundraiser for the Canadian Cancer Society, will take place on Oct. 24, beginning at 11 a.m.

Organizers hope to raise $10,000 from the 12-kilometre event.

The walk will go from Newtonbrook Secondary School at Yonge and Steeles to York University, and then back to Newtonbrook.

Polly Kishinevski attended both these North York schools and was about to enter her second year at York in the general arts program.

Kishinevski died on July 22 (Tisha b'Av) from a rare form of stomach cancer. She is the youngest person in medical history to have died from this type of cancer.

Kirill Zaretsky, 23, Kishinevski's former boyfriend and a York University philosophy major is the principal organizer behind the event.

It will be a full day event. A yard sale will follow the walkathon in the cafeteria at Newtonbook, Zaretsky said. All proceeds will go to the Canadian Cancer Society, in Kishinevski's name.

"It's going to be a big day," Zaretsky said. "There will be the yard sale, a raffle, a silent auction to win autographed sports memorabilia and two tickets to the show, The Wizard of Oz."

He also adds there will be henna tattoos and refreshments.

Zaretsky and 12 volunteers have placed 50 tzedakah boxes around Toronto to "raise awareness about Polly and cancer," he said.

"Cancer can affect anyone, rabbi or layman," Zaretzky said, and he wants everyone to realize this.

One of Kishinevski's close friends, Joy Young, wrote in a recent public letter: "...one of Polly's smiles could grab the attention of all those who surrounded her ...Polly was a very special person who touched so many people. She will be missed greatly."

Kishinevski's hobbies included singing – which was her passionate love. She sang at assemblies during her years at Fisherville Junior High and was an active participant in the annual Newtonbrook musicals.

Zaretsky recalls that Kishinevski once recorded a tape of her music to make her ill grandfather feel better.

Discovered recently was a letter Kishinevski wrote to God on Aug. 24, 1998 — almost a year before her death.

She wrote that she had the gift to "bring joy into the lives of those who lacked it, to bring wisdom to those whose eyes needed to be opened and to bring love to those who needed to be loved."

"No 18-year-old should die in vain," Zaretsky said. "We are doing this so people won't forget her."

For more information, contact Kirill Zaretsky at pager number 416-721-5660 or e-mail yu177298@york.ca.

Nizkor Web site faces uncertain future

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An extensive educational Web site that has played a significant role in debunking Holocaust denial faces a tenuous future, unless further funding is secured.

Ken McVay, founder and director of the Nizkor Project (www.nizkor.org), said last week he has sufficient funding to last only until January.

"Even though there has been some very strong support from a few very generous people, it hasn't been enough," McVay, 59, said in a phone interview from his home on Vancouver Island, B.C.

He is in the process of determining the site's commercial value, although he said it is not currently for sale and he does not foresee shutting it down.

McVay has listed the site on www.GreatDomains.com with an "asking price" of $500,000, based on the size of Nizkor and the amount of traffic it attracts.

The site receives about 9,000 hits a day, said McVay. It has grown from 27 pages in 1995 to almost 5,000 pages, including the entire transcript of the trial of Adolf Eichmann, he added.

McVay is proud to have those transcripts, the product of 18 months of negotiation. "I know that the Holocaust deniers, who absolutely revile this site and me, refuse to talk about the Eichmann trial. They can't lie about it now."

The job is never-ending, said McVay. Among his current projects, he is working on making documentation from the Nuremburg trials available.

Although McVay says the years of devoting himself to Nizkor have left him weary, his tone of voice – and the fact he recently spent four consecutive 20-hour days on the project – belie his claim. "Of course I care," he asserted. "I never stop caring. I don't know what I'd do without [Nizkor]. It's my life."

McVay believes that only a "small and very dedicated group of people" do care.

He guesses that of the estimated 100 to 300 million Internet users in the world, only about 100 are actively involved in fighting racism on the Net.

Nizkor began when McVay, a non-Jew with a long-standing interest in World War II, encountered Holocaust denial on the Internet in the early 1990s. He was angered by the bigotry he perceived.

"I'm still angry," he said. "It makes me angry that there are very few people in the world who give a damn about this."

A native of Santa Clara, Calif., McVay grew up in a middle-class neighborhood where, to the best of his knowledge, racism didn't exist. In high school, about half his friends were not white. "We never thought about it," he said. "Maybe I was just naive."

Although McVay had read extensively about World War II, he knew little about the Holocaust per se. "I had just enough background to know that [Holocaust denial] was crap, but I didn't have a clue why it was crap."

McVay made it his business – his obsession, actually – to learn the truth, and show it to the rest of the world.

"That's the beauty of the Internet," he said. "Most people exposed to the venom of Holocaust deniers do not have the time or resources to check the so-called facts they provide." The Net, he noted, has given him access to prosecutors, historians and community leaders who have provided Nizkor with testimony and answers.

Over the years, McVay has developed a worldwide network of dozens of volunteers to help him access, translate and post material.

The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada administers the Nizkor Fund, through which donations to support the Web site can be channeled.

Women and Holocaust focus of Web site

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 46,000 hits have been recorded on the first Web site dedicated exclusively to the issue of women and the Holocaust.

The site was founded almost two years ago by Judy Weissenberg Cohen, who was born in Hungary in 1928, and lost about two-thirds of her family in the Holocaust.

It is dedicated, she says on the home page, "to all those women who were murdered while pregnant; holding little hands of children or carrying infants in their arms on the way to be gassed; in hiding; to the mothers who gave their children to be hidden, many never to find them again; or as fighters in the resistance, in ghettos, forests, partisan units. And to the lives of those few who survived and bravely carried on."

Cohen spoke recently at the opening meeting of the Child Survivor/Hidden Children committee of the Holocaust Educational and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

"To understand the Holocaust completely, we have to know about the gender specific problems of women. They have a particular story to tell. Women did not necessarily suffer more than men; they just suffered differently," she said.

Over the years, said Cohen, who is chair of the Holocaust Memorial Centre's speaker's bureau, she had come across several books about women and the Holocaust. However, as she began researching the topic on the Internet, she was "saddened by the glaring omission of the topic. I thought it would be interesting to bring the issue to a much larger audience."

With the help of Jeff Freedman of B. Webb and Associates, who at no charge, did the bulk of the technical work, and with recent help from Cohen's son Jonathan, they put together a site that contains the works and reflections of various writers.

"It was designed to be low key. There are no commercials, and we will not hook up with any advertisers. This is a modest venue. I am in the midst of inquiring about receiving funding," she said.

She also seeks the contribution of articles, scholarly essays, personal stories and book reviews.

It is a slow process, Cohen said, "but we are making inroads, especially among students. Our aim is to reach as many young people as possible. It is a one-issue Web site, so with the number of hits we've had, there is obvious interest."

She recently won an award from the Jewish Agency for Israel for her site. The Web site address is www.interlog.com/~mighty or you can e-mail Cohen at mighty@interlog.com.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

They're back! The 36th Parliament began its second session with all the pomp and circumstance associated with the speech from the throne. And although the very presence of the new governor general gave a nod to the multicultural character of contemporary Canadian society, there was nothing in the text that spoke directly to any "Jewish" concerns. That was to be expected, but in discussion with some parliamentarians who ought to know, there appears to be no "Jewish" agenda, even from the perspective of the Jewish community!

Of course, concerns about Israel and the bilateral relationship are ever present. And one supposes that the usual laments about Nazi war criminals in Canada, a dedicated Holocaust museum and Swiss bank reparations will probably surface from time to time. However, a real and timely agenda seems to be absent , and as the saying goes: "use it or lose it" (the Jewish political influence).

Thus, as an unsolicited public service to Jewish institutions, we have assembled a sampling of issues, accounting for jurisdictional differences, that they might consider pursuing over the course of this Parliamentary sitting.

• Jewish Holidays: There is currently no protection for Jews who wish to observe religious holidays. The consequences and penalties are both arbitrary and varied since the labor codes do not address the issue in any systematic or comprehensive way. If a Jew wants to observe his or her holiday, pressure should be exerted to provide reasonable accommodation.

• Jewish Schools: Although education is a provincial mandate, there are some charter issues that have never been pursued. Chief among them is the entitlement of children with special needs to the same support services provided in the public school system.

• Passover Food: Every year, problems arise – and not just in Quebec – with the importation of Passover food that is not bilingually labelled. It would be nice if the community was pro-active in seeking a permanent waiver of the relevant regulations in an effort to avoid a last-minute crisis in the month before Passover.

The point here, is that there is no shortage of issues – big and small – that could be pursued in the political sector. Admittedly, these are rather parochial matters. But if these aren't the kind of concerns uppermost in the minds – and on the agendas – of Jewish communities, what are?

Outremont Chassidim 'harassed,' tensions rise

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The simmering tensions between Chassidim and other residents of Outremont are again reaching a boiling point, with some Chassidim saying they feel harassed because of repeated trivial complaints against them.

They charge that the police are not taking their complaints seriously enough, yet apparently following up on complaints levelled against them.

In a rare public appeal, a spokesperson for the community, Jack Hartstein, has gone to the media to air grievances.

B'nai Brith has also received "an enormous" number of calls from Chassidim, asking for its intervention, said Raphael Lallouz, community relations director of the organization.

B'nai Brith has been investigating the situation and has received assurances from the commander of the police station serving Outremont that he will look into specific complaints from Chassidim that police officers unfairly handled certain situations.

The troubles appear to be confined to one district of Outremont, the area around Lajoie and Du-Rocher Avenues, and the great majority of the complaints filed with police have come from one person, Céline Forget.

In March 1997, Forget sued the Amour Pour Israel Congregation, of the Vishnitzer community, for violating zoning bylaws by operating a synagogue in a building at the corner of Lajoie and Durocher designated for residential use. Forget, who moved into Outremont about four years ago, lives in an apartment above where the synagogue was located.

Just days before the case was to be heard in Quebec Superior Court last June, the congregation moved out of the building to a temporary location on Van Horne Avenue, ending a decade-long dispute.

However, that has not brought peace in the area. Hartstein said numerous complaints have been made to the police against Chassidim for the slightest infractions of noise, parking or littering regulations. There have been objections to sukkot and to the completion of an eruv. He complained of verbal abuse against Chassidim, and even their children.

There have also been incidents of a chassidic man being shoved on the street and another being shot with a pellet gun.

The community admits it has engaged in some minor retaliation, such as throwing eggs at Forget's car or pouring glue into her lock.

Last December, she told the media that she had been the victim of several threats and acts of harassment. A patrol car was sent in every morning and night to escort Forget in and out of her apartment.

As a result of the community's complaints, Commander Robert Sauvé of Station 36 on Mount Royal, which covers Outremont, has instructed officers to take full reports and bring to his personal attention any incident in the area involving Chassidim.

"Tensions are rising and we don't want it to go higher than that," he said.

The police, B'nai Brith and the Chassidim are continuing to meet to calm the situation, although all agree there is no clear solution.

Outremont city councillor Sydney Pfeiffer, an Orthodox Jew seeking his third term in the Nov. 7 election, said harassment and intimidation are not words that are too strong to use to describe what some Chassidim are experiencing.

"[Forget] uses every opportunity she can to make their life difficult," he said. The police are in a 'damned if you do, damned if you don't' situation. If they don't respond to her complaints, she can file a complaint against them, he said.

"I think this thing will just have to take its natural course, and die out...The city can't do anything. Hopefully, someone in the Québécois community will take her aside and say this is not doing anyone any good."

Alex Werzberger, a Satmar Chassid and head of the chassidic community council, described what's going on as "rabble-rousing." He is concerned that a climate is being created that may lead to violence. "Agitating can bring out the baser nature of people."

Werzberger said there is a perception that the police at the rank-and-file level have a "bias" against the Chassidim in this dispute. He points to the charging of Chassidim for throwing eggs "that hit no one," but a police officer's not taking a report when another Chassid was shoved and had his payes pulled on the street.

However, he warned that the situation should not be "blown out of proportion" and is confined to a small area. "I live a block away, and I don't see anything."

Polish Jewish database created

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — More than a half-million birth, marriage and death records of Jews in over 130 towns and villages in 19th-century Poland are now indexed on the Internet.

Jewish Records Indexing-Poland (JRI) is the work of about 400 volunteers in different parts of the world, co-ordinated by Montrealer Stanley Diamond.

Diamond founded the project a couple of years ago to provide a previously unavailable tool to those embarking on genealogical research. "It's a valuable first step in finding clues to locating family records" amid the massive archives scattered throughout Poland, he said.

The work is just beginning, he said, and new entries are being added all the time. The goal is to eventually enter all of the millions of existing Jewish vital records for thousands of Polish towns and villages.

The records, dating from 1808, the start of the Napoleonic era, are a treasure trove for genealogists, Diamond said. Records were thorough and meticulously kept, and have been carefully preserved. They remain remarkably intact, despite the passage of time, wars, and other upheavals of the region.

Diamond estimates that 80-85 percent of Jewish records have survived.

The JRI database does not contain the actual records.The site allows for searches by names, towns or provinces, as well as by years of the records.

The site's address is www.jewishgen.org/jri-pl

Yossi Arditi. A Portrait in Courage.

'It was very dark outside, with not even the moon to give us light, when the Molotov Cocktail hit the centre of the Jeep; the bottle shattered all over us and started to burn us. I was trapped in the back seat, burning like a living torch. Everything was burning. I managed to get out of the jeep. I had burns all over my body. I was hospitalized for 10 months and had countless plastic surgery operations. Through it all, my wife, children, parents and friends were by my side.

I had to stay in bed for six months. During this time I was introduced to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. I initially visited the Centre for physiotherapy and then learned there were many more activities. Beit Halochem becAme my second home. Everyone made me feel very comfortable because everyone was in the same boat. I felt protected and cared for. I have no doubt that Beit Halochem helped me in the best way possible. There were times when they actually helped me forget my dreadful injuries.

From the bottom of my heart, I want to thank those who thought of the idea of establishing a place like Beit Halochem, for those of us who have suffered injuries and are now disabled. I want to thank those who manage it, and those who contribute to it with such generosity.'

Humanitarian award to be presented at Hadassah convention

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A newly created humanitarian award will be presented by Hadassah-WIZO Organization of Canada at its next national convention.

The theme of the convention, which is being organized by a committee of over 80, is Dor L'Dor – Generation to Generation.

On Nov. 13, at the Saturday Night Gala, the humanitarian award will be given posthumously to Chiune Sugihara, who served as the Japanese consul general in Kaunas (Kovno) Lithuania in 1940.

Sugihara was responsible for saving thousands of Polish and Lithuanian Jews by issuing Japanese transit visas, against the explicit orders of his government.

With the visas, the Jews were able to travel by train to Moscow, then on to Kobe, Japan. Some remained there, others continued on to China and various other countries.

Sugihara and his wife, Yukiko, risked their personal safety to help the refugees.

The Japanese government dismissed Sugihara from his diplomatic post, ending his career and causing him and his family financial hardship.

For many years, Sugihara never spoke of his actions during the war, until, in 1969, he was located by an Israeli Embassy official who had been saved because of one of the visas.

Sugihara was awarded Israel's highest honor as Righteous Among the Nations by the Yad Vashem Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority, as well as many other honors for his heroic efforts.

The humanitarian award will be accepted by Sugihara's son, Hiroki at the Gala.

The Israeli and Japanese ambassadors to Canada will be present, as will many representatives of the Canadian political establishment.

Allan Marshall, of Montreal, whose mother and grandparents were saved by Sugihara, will be present at the Gala to tell his family's story. He will be bringing with him his infant daughter who represents yet another generation which would not exist if not for Chiune Sugihara.

Herb Gray, deputy prime minister of Canada, will be the recipient of the 1999 Canadian Award, given to citizens who have displayed exemplary humanitarian qualities.

Gray has been a member of Parliament, representing Windsor West, since 1962 and has worked extensively as a minister and as an MP in a variety of portfolios.

Gray is a member of the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue in Windsor and of Machzikei Hadas Congregation in Ottawa. He is an active participant in the Jewish community.

Numerous individuals throughout the convention will be honored, beginning with the Friday night Shabbat dinner on Nov. 12 featuring Rabbi Elyse Goldstein of Toronto as keynote speaker.

On that evening, the family of the organization's first president, Lillian Freiman, will be honored and multi-generational Hadassah-WIZO families will be recognized.

Several events will be open to the public, including the Nov. 13 luncheon at which Women of Achievement Awards will be presented to eight distinguished Canadian women.

Former Conservative cabinet minister Flora MacDonald will speak on behalf of the honorees who include The Honorable Justice Beverley McLachlin; Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan; Heather Reisman, president and CEO of Indigo Books and Music; author Anne Michaels; Celia Franca, founder of the National Ballet of Canada; Alison Smith of CBC Newsworld; and education policy activist Ruth Goldbloom.

Reuven Feuerstein, Director of Hadassah-WIZO Canada Research Institute in Jerusalem and professor of psychology at Bar Ilan University will be a featured speaker at the Youth Services Program.

Feuerstein will discuss his research work with children and youths suffering from severe learning disabilities.

Ronald Lauder, chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, President of the Jewish National Fund in the United States, international businessman and philanthropist, will receive the Rebecca Sieff Award at the closing Sunday luncheon.

Various workshops on such topics as fundraising and motivational speaking will take place, and there will be a poster session illustrating and describing Hadassah-WIZO's projects and success stories in Israel.

The 36th annual convention will take place at the Westin Hotel in Ottawa from November 11-14.

For further information, contact Marion Mayman in Ottawa at 613-820-4975 or Lily Frank, National Executive Vice-President at 514-937-9431. Individuals and families of individuals whose lives were saved by Chiune Sugihara are invited to contact Mayman.

Lawsuit launched against Air France over prayers

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Montreal Jewish businessman has launched a $150,000 lawsuit against Air France and one of its employees for allegedly trying to stop him from saying his morning prayers on a Paris-bound flight from Montreal.

According to documents filed Sept. 30 in Quebec Superior Court, Michael Chernack, says in the early morning of April 25, about two hours before landing in Paris, he was standing and praying in a small alcove towards the rear of the plane.

He alleges that chief steward Joel Corneloup told him: "This is an airplane and not a place for occult practices."

After finishing his prayers and returning to his seat, Chernack spoke with Corneloup, who allegedly told him that the "policy" of Air France, is not to allow prayers on its aircraft.

Air France lawyer Gilbert Poliquin told The CJN that Air France will deny the charges, saying it has no such policy against praying and that the incident was the result of a misunderstanding on board.

Chernack, 45, a Hampstead resident who imports textiles from Europe and the Far East, contends in the court document that the way he was treated amounts to religious discrimination and it was "a clear contravention" of his rights.

"What happened...was intolerable and a gross violation of his fundamental right to practice his religion without fear of physical or verbal threats and abuse," the document says.

In an interview, Chernack, who describes himself as "observant," said he was appalled by the steward's behavior.

Chernack said the incident took place while most passengers slept; he deliberately tried to avoid disturbing them by standing in a small alcove towards the rear of the plane so that he did not block the aisles.

He said there were no security issues since both the non-smoking and fasten-seat-belt signs were not illuminated.

He said he recited his prayers in an "inaudible" manner at about dawn, when Corneloup told him a "very harsh and threatening way" to return to his seat.

Because he was in the midst of prayer, Chernack said he could not respond. Corneloup demanded again that he return to his seat, and again there was no response from Chernack; Corneloup then proceeded towards the front of the plane, Chernack recalled.

He said he feared for his personal well-being and quickly finished his prayers before returning to his seat. The court documents state that he feared Corneloup would "physically remove Plaintiff's prayer shawl and phylacteries and force him back to his seat."

The court documents accuse Corneloup of acting in an "extremely rude, aggressive and threatening manner."

The lawsuit is "a point of principle that has to be made," Chernack said. "Once he [the steward] said it was policy [not to allow prayer], he made it a rights issue.

"I think a statement has to be made to all airlines. It's really something they shouldn't get away with. The message has to be made."

Air France's Marc Laforge, who was interviewed on the radio about the incident, indicated that Chernack may have been blocking the aisles or should have notified a flight attendant about his intention to pray. Laforge also said that Air France had no policy barring prayer.

Laforge reportedly stated that Chernack was asked to return to his seat because breakfast was about to be served and that the steward apologized when he discovered Chernack had been praying.

Chernack, however, adamantly denies ever blocking any aisle or receiving any apology.

As for having to notify an attendant about praying, Chernack said:

"If they say you can pray but have to ask, then there is a policy. It doesn't make much sense."

Besides which, Chernack contends that Corneloup explicitly told him there was a policy prohibiting prayer.

אריק ושלום כבר לא צ'ילבות:

אריק איינשטיין ושלום חנוך קשורים איכשהו לנעוריים של כל מי שגדל בישראל. הצירוף שלהם בתחילת שנות השבעים הוליד את הרוק הישראלי והיה לו את האפקט הישראלי של ה"חיפושיות" כעשר שנים קודם לכן. "למה לי לקחת ללב", "לולי" ודומיהם שקעו בתוך תאי המוח שלנו, וכדרכם של שירים, הם מזכירים לנו איפה היינו ומה עשינו. לכולנו היו שערות ארוכות, וכולנו התעגענו למהפכת ילדי הפרחים האמריקנית שהחמצנו, כי רק נמרנו את מלחמת ששת הימים ומלחמת ההתשה היתה בעיצומה, ובכלל- היינו מרוכזים מידי וצייתנים מידי. אז אריק איינשטיין ושלום חנוך היו קצה הדמיון הפרוע שלנו. אחר כך הם רבו, כמו כל שני אמנים ישראלים שמכבדים את עצמם, והיו צ'יללבה למשך דור שלם. כל אחד מהם המשיך והתקדם והפך לחלק מהפנתיאון הישראלי קצר הימים של כוכבי על. עכשיו הם עשו שולם ובכך הביאו לקטארזיס עצום לכל מוקירי זכרם. הם עבדו על תקליט חדש שאת רובו כתב אריק והלחין שלום, ואריק שר בעיקר. יש בתקליט את הניצוצות של פעם, ומבחינות רבות זה נשמע כמו שני חברים טובים באמת שנפגשים אחרי דור ומתחילים לדבר מהמקום שהפסיקו, כאיילו לא קרה דבר. השיר הפותח נותן קצת רמז לשוובות של פעם:

"כל אחד רוצה להיות מנכ"ל
להיות מזכ"ל
להיות מטכ"ל,"

תקציר הסינדרום הישראלי - יהודי: כל אחד רוצה להיות המנהל נותן הפקודות . אף אחד לא רוצה להיות פראייר של אף אחד. ממש מחלה לאומית. לתקליט קוראים "מוסקטו" והוא שווה שמיעה. שירים יפים, נאיביים, ולעיתים מרגשים. האמת, הם כבר לא מה שהיו פעם. אבל צריך להודות, גם אנחנו לא.

ש"ס בת חמש עשרה:

מפלגת ש"ס , שמייצגת את המהפכה החברתית הספרדית הוקמה לפני חמש עשרה שנה. מבחירות לבחירות התעצם כוחה, ובבחירות האחרונות היא לקחה מידי הליכוד מספר רב של מנדטים, והפכה למפלגה בגודלו של הליכוד עצמו. ממש מדהים לקרוא כמה רבים משריה וחברי הכנסת שלה הורשעו בפלילים וכמה נוספים עדיין בהליך המשפטי. על פי דעת רוב הפרשנים, עלייתה הנדולה בבחירות האחרונות נזקפת לפחות באופן חלקי לכעסם של ספרדים רבים על הרשעתו בפליליים של אריה דרעי. ועל כן מדהים עוד יותר לראות שעכשיו, פחות מחצי שנה מהבחירות, מתנערים ממנו חבריו ומנסים למחוק את השפעתו. האם זה רק ביטוי לכוחנות ולכרישיות הישראלית, או שמא באמת החליט הרב יוסף שמספיק עבדו עליו עם הרמאויות האלה ושהגיע הזמן לדבוק בערכים של מוסר ציבורי וצדק, כיאות לאנשים שומרי מצוות. בראיון עם המנהיג החדש, אלי ישי, נוצר רושם ברור שהוא איננו מתכונן לסבול את פריצות החוק של אריה דרעי וחבר מרעיו, ושהוא נחוש להפוך את המפלגה הזו לארגון שדובק בחוק ובאתיקה. כל זה בזכותו של אהוד ברק שעמד על כך שלא יישא ויתן עם ש"ס כל עוד אריה דרעי עומד בראשה או שולט בה. הציניקנים אמרו: תראו, הוא יתפטר אך ימשיך למשוך בחוטים. ולא כך היה. דרעי באמת בחוץ ואיתו אנשיו. בהחלט סיכוי לתפנית חיובית

Student interest in Birthright Israel soars

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Applications for free trips to Israel are flooding in from young people across Canada, says the executive director of Birthright Israel Canada.

"They're coming in fast and furious," Elizabeth Sokolsky says.

Birthright Israel, an initiative of Canadian philanthropist Charles Bronfman and his American colleague Michael H. Steinhardt, offers Jewish young people ages 18 to 26 a trip to Israel with all expenses paid except travel insurance and spending money.

This inaugural program is a partnership of philanthropists, Jewish communities nationally and the Israeli government.

Last week, Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shochat authorized $70 million US over five years for the program, which had been supported by the previous government as well.

In February, about a thousand university-aged Jews will leave from across Canada. They will be chosen by lottery.

A specific number of spots has been designated for each community: Toronto has 325 spots; Montreal 200; Vancouver, 70 and Winnipeg, 30. The others will come from smaller communities.

Applications are multiplying as the Oct. 21 deadline approaches. Participants chosen will be notified by Nov. 15.

Sokolsky's staff receive calls from across Canada, as they answer queries to 1-800-567-ISRAEL.

"When we walk in every morning, it ranges from 50 to 70 calls on the voice mail. We're having an incredible time keeping up. The phone is ringing every day," she says.

The centre has hired a part-time employee to help enter applications into its database.

Jeremy Zacks, president of the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) at York University, has also observed the magnitude of student excitement about the trip.

Students confront him in the university halls, in the JSF office, even at home, by phone, wanting more information about the trips.

Not that he minds, he says.

Between 20 and 30 people visit the JSF office every day with inquiries about the trips, and as a result, many have become interested in joining the organization.

"They're coming in and realizing what the JSF has to offer," Zacks says.

Advertising splashed across campus helped generate interest in the trips. "Israel For Free" banners were hung at parties, ads were placed in the campus newspaper and flyers were posted across the university.

Zacks now carries trip applications in his knapsack and fields calls from anxious applicants wondering how many applications the JSF has received.

Young people from unfederated communities across Ontario that don't have a strong local infrastructure, have been designated 45 spots, says Michael Soberman, director of community services at Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, which serves these small communities.

Based on the number they have received, he expects that there will be three or four times as many applications as designated spots.

Campus and community staff across the country report that news about the project is reaching the uninvolved and unaffiliated Jews who were the target population of the initiative.

Gabe Meranda, executive director of Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation, noticed this when 55 people attended a Birthright Israel information night at the University of British Columbia.

"Fully 85 to 90 percent of that crowd we'd never seen before," Meranda says.

Ruthie Saragosti, co-ordinator of Montreal's Israel Experience Centre, has seen the same trend.

Applicants are "very nearly skewed towards kids who did not go through the private Jewish day school system or have not had significant involvement in the organized Jewish community," she says.

The applicants' main concern is that they won't be chosen for the trip, she adds. As of last Wednesday, the Montreal centre had already received 310 applications.

"We've created almost this monster – everyone is talking about it and now everyone's getting nervous about not getting on the trip," Saragosti says.

Wycliffe has now started construction - and the planting of a thousand more trees!

Living in the heart of the Wyldwood forest!

Applause and cheers filled the air at a celebration recently held for the start of construction and the planting of a thousand new trees at Wycliffe's Richmond Hill community of Wyldwood.An enclave of only 84 luxury Townhomes, Wyldwood's families will enjoy living amidst the natural spendour of the Wyldwood Forest, located on Bathurst St. just north of Elgin Mills Road.

Planting of new trees heralds the start of construction

Attending this important event were Mayor Bill Bell, Councilor David Bishop, Wycliffe principals Al Sandler and Gary Bensky, plus many other town and company officials. To enthusiastic applause, the mayor with shovel in hand ceremoniously turned over the first soil to mark the start of construction. Wycliffe principal Al Sandler in his speech said, "In Wycliffe's 50 year history, this is the most stunning site the company has ever built in. And, for the first time ever, my wife said that she would like to live here too!" The ceremony concluded with a wine and cheese buffet held inside the Wyldwood sales centre.

Landmark Managed Maintenance Plan

Besides having beautiful forest backyards to gaze upon, residents will enjoy a Wyldwood lifestyle that's designed with their wishes in mind. All essential amenities are within easy driving distance and, for those who have reached that state of mind where doing outdoor yardwork holds no appeal, they have the wonderful freedom of joining Wycliffe's Landmark Managed Maintenance Plan. It's a maintenance plan which, will take care of exterior paint, snow removal, lawn mowing and provide you with a state-of-the-art home security system. With nearly half-century of experience, Wycliffe Homes has achieved its highest building standards ever at Wyldwood.

Many designs include such features as:

- English inspired exteriors crafted with brick and stone
- Solid oak hardwood floors
- Double car garages with automatic garage opener
- Dual-tone interlocking brick driveways
- Cathedral and coffered ceilings
- Marble and granite flooring
- Custom designed millwork & crown mouldings
- Luxurious whirlpool

The Wyldwood sales office, and decorated model home, are located just above Elgin Mills Dr. on the west side of Yonge St. Sales office hours are Mon. - Thurs. 1 pm. - 8 pm. Fridays closed. Weekends and holidays 11 am. to 6 pm. Call (905) 883-1294 for more information.

Brighten your autumn with Royal

After almost 20 years at its Avenue Rd. location, Royal Lighting has built a spacious new showroom. Set close to the sidewalk, the high, wide windows let the featured pieces sparkle like diamonds.

Of the 30,000 cars which pass Royal each day, many slow to look in the windows. Visible 2 blocks away, they are illuminated till 1 a.m.

This well- lit, expansive room lets Royal spread merchandise out so each piece shows in the best light. And inside, there's as much viewing space as in the windows.

The message is clear: lighting is one of the most esthetically satisfying ways to upgrade your home. For practical reasons as well, fall is a good time to think about upgrading your lighting

Whether with family or guests, you'll be spending more time indoors. To make your home warmer and brighter, you may be thinking about a chandelier for the dining room, or pot lights for the rec room. Whatever you need, you'll find it at Royal.

Outdoor lighting gives better safety and convenience; brightening your driveway, for example, makes life easier for you and your guests. And Royal has a full selection of lights and fixtures for lawn, garden, garage or driveway, or even a backyard rink for your kids.

With 200 different suppliers, Royal carries a huge range of lights and fixtures to match every budget, need and taste: from economy lines (e.g. bulbs by the case), to upscale hand-crafted work, including a full selection of Schonbek crystal. And there are lamp shades too.

Royal is also Canada's largest Casablance fan dealer, with items ranging from $129 to $1,200. Besides cooling your home in summer, a fan saves heat in fall and winter by distributing warm air evenly.

Every Royal salesperson is an accredited lighting consultant. You enjoy the same service as the many designers, decorators and builders who buy lighting and fixtures here. If you buy a lamp, for example, staff will ask about window illumination, wall colour and other variables, so that you get what suits your home.

You will find Royal Lighting at 1549 Avenue Road; telephone (416) 782-1129.

The Enclave in Thornhill builds on Vogue success

The Vogue Development Group is a father-and-sons business whose success stems largely from dedication and enthusiasm. The principals bring together decades of experience, a keen understanding of trends in the housing industry, and a personal style of management to create dwellings of distinctive quality. Many fine homes in and around Toronto bear witness to Vogue's integrity.

Vogue builds upscale carriage trade homes throughout the Greater Toronto Area, in exclusive communities like Richmond Hill's Bayview Hill and Palace Court, Thornhill Village Estates in Vaughan, Etobicoke's Lloyd Manor Estates, and Spring Farm in Thornhill. Vogue's wide-ranging portfolio also includes land development, commercial and industrial projects.

Track record exceeds a quarter century

Founding father Morris Greenbaum has ridden out the industry's ups and downs since 1957. Carrying on the tradition, his sons Lou and Garry joined him in 1990 to create The Vogue Development Group, a true family business.

Each partner contributes his own special expertise and experience. Lou is also a spokesman for the industry. He was Ontario President of the Urban Development Institute in 1982-83, National President in 1984. He is still an active member of the Board of Directors and Executive Committee.

After-sales service rated "Excellent" under Ontario New Home Warranty Program

The Greenbaums take an active role in day-to-day operations, giving each customer their personal attention. "People are more demanding these days," Lou admits; "but with most of our business coming from referrals, we are meeting these demands."

As a home buyer, you can personally depend on the partners to satisfy your concerns and live up to your expectations. You can meet with the architect, and the principals are available for consultation at every stage of building and finishing. In every way possible, Vogue strives to give you exactly what you want.

Every Vogue home is custom or custom-quality. "No one we build for," Garry promises, "has to have exactly the same house as anyone else." To create your special home and surroundings, Vogue will customize both the inside and the outside.

To ensure quality work, Vogue sets high standards for its tradespeople, some of whom have worked with the Greenbaums for over 25 years. As masters of their trade, they give every job their best. The ultimate test of their work: after sales, repairs are kept to a minimum.

And this commitment to lasting quality is recognized by the industry. It has earned Vogue the exclusive "Excellent" rating from the Ontario New Home Warranty Program for superior after-sales service.

Currently, Vogue is building an Enclave of 41 detached homes on lots with 50-foot frontages, in the Wilshire neighborhood of Thornhill. These homes range from 2,600 to 4,600 square feet; prices start at $419,000.

Having worked in Thornhill for about 25 years, the Greenbaums know the community well, and have a long record of involvement and participation. And the Enclave will be an integral part of this community.

An in-fill site, the Enclave is set in the midst of an established neighborhood. Shopping, schools and buses are within easy access; Centre St., Bathurst St. and the Promenade are minutes away. There is an adjacent park as well.

Nine different basic designs, differences in elevation, and a great variety of custom details ensure that your home will be unique. These details include cathedral ceilings, coffered ceilings, soaring 2-storey inner spaces, columns, art niches and extra large windows.

Options galore ensure uniqueness

The features offered, which vary from home to home, include:

- Precast sills, arches and clay brick detailing;
- Casement windows;
- Nine-foot main floor ceilings;
- Circular oak staircases to basement;
- Gas fireplaces;
- Upgraded wood trim and brass hardware on doorways and windows;
- French doors to library;
- 5/8-inch tongue-and-groove spruce subfloor;
- Oak strip floors and plaster cornice mouldings in living and dining rooms;
- High efficiency gas furnace;
- Whirlpool tub in master ensuite;
- Gourmet kitchen with island and breakfast bar.

If you'd like to learn more about The Enclave in Thornhill, come and visit the Vogue Development Group's on-site model home and sales office at 30 Concord Road. Take Centre Street west from Bathurst to Concord Road, then turn north on Concord. The office is open from 1 to 7 p.m. on weekdays, and noon to 6 p.m. on weekends; call (905) 763-4111.

You'll find other Vogue building sites in the Bayview Hill and Yonge/Carrville areas of Richmond Hill, and several in-fill locations in central and north Toronto. For information on these homes, call (905) 886-8500.

A one-of-a-kind address is coming to the new Upper Village

Imagine a setting filled with the ambiance that you have come to expect from a home in one Toronto's most preferred neighbourhoods. It's a remarkable new condominium address with just 47 suites in the heart of a vibrant community. A building with style and panache and all of the substance of the stately homes that surround it.

"If you're looking for an elegant condominium in the new Upper Village on Bathurst St. - one that's designed on a more personal and refined scale, there really is only One Glen Park." says Barbara Klein, in-house sales associate.

Located in the established AlexanderWood neighbourhood just north of Glencairn on Bathurst St., One Glen Park will consist of just 47 elegant residences with fine finishings, private balconies and terraces, Shabbat elevator, built-in brand name appliances, 9' ceilings, health club facilities, underground parking, individual heating and cooling controls, oversized windows and more. Prices for suites will begin at $275,000 and will go up to just under a million dollars for the palatial penthouses.

The neighbourhood itself is in the heart of Bathurst St. in the new Upper Village with shopping, drug stores, medical centres, synagogues, Jewish Learning Centres, parks and the subway are all just a short walk away.

One Glen Park is being developed by Felcorp - the developer behind some of Toronto's most successful condominiums- in a joint venture with The Bowmore Group.

Many of the people who have expressed interest in One Glen Park are mature couples who no longer want the burden of keeping up a larger home but want to stay in a neighbourhood they are comfortable in. Others are single women who love the Upper Village address and want the style - and lifestyle - of an elegant condominium. There are even younger couples who want to live somewhere that is unique and personal.

For more information, or a personal appointment, you should call (416) 784-2800 today.

Barak favors economic separation from Palestinian 'entity'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak has been leaning toward economic separation between Israel and the Palestinian entity to be established as a result of the final status talks. But after receiving plans for three possible economic arrangements from Finance Minister Avraham Shochat last weekend, Barak is considering a free trade agreement.

Shochat and his director-general, Avi Ben-Bassat, presented the alternatives in Barak's office. During the discussion, Barak claimed that both sides have an interest in economic separation: the Palestinians, because of their desire for greater independence from Israel, and the Israelis, because of their concerns over security and crime prevention.

The question, according to Barak, will be the nature of the fence between them. The prime minister said his working assumption is "that the fence will be as friendly as possible and will allow for political, security, and economic co-operation."

The first alternative proposed by Shochat was to have a customs union that would allow the free movement of goods between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, as well as uniform indirect taxes and customs duties and reciprocal determination and calculation of taxes.

The second proposal – the one favored by Barak – foresees an economic separation that would allow for the potential taxation of the movement of goods, various indirect taxes and the possibility of trade agreements between the entities and a third party.

The last proposal would establish a duty-free zone for local goods, with the potential for indirect taxation at different rates, and different duty rates and trade agreements with other countries.

Elder statesman dies at 90

Burg was known for his moderate and conciliatory approach and was not pleased at the sharp turn rightward the National Religious Party took after his retirement from politics.

Shimon Peres, one of Burg's few rivals for political longevity, said Burg "was aware of the contradiction between a faith that tends to reject compromise and a state that is obliged to make compromises."

Prime Minister Ehud Barak said a conversation with Burg "was always an intellectual challenge of the first order." He said Burg had been privileged to see his son, Avraham, become speaker of the Knesset.

Avraham Burg, who spoke last, noted that most of those present were taking their final leave of a public personality, but for him and his family, "this is a farewell from our own private dearly beloved. Shalom to you and thank you for being such a wonderful father to us. The great tree that propped up our home has been cut down."

Kurt Rothschild, chair of world Mizrachi and president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, attended Burg's funeral in Jerusalem.

Contacted in Jerusalem, he told The CJN: "There was an overwhelming feeling of great loss by all shades of public opinion here.

Burg with UN Secretary General Kofi Anan [RNS/Reuters]

There was not a single negative voice on Dr. Burg, who was considered one of the fathers of the forming of the State of Israel and a pioneer in its progress. A man of great tolerance, a man of great understanding for and by the entire spectrum of the population."

Jack Kahn, president of Mizrachi Canada described Burg as "one of the true great leaders of the State of Israel. He was also a great leader for the Mizrachi movement.

"Even at the age of 90," Kahn said, "Burg was still travelling to many countries on behalf of the State of Israel. He came to Canada on many occasions. His last visit was just over a year ago, in May 1998.

"For Mizrachi, he was a great leader and a great unifying force to the entire community. Dr. Burg was accepted and revered by all streams and all factions and was able to unify us and bring us together."

He will be remembered "for his passion for Jews, not just in Israel but all over the world. He embodied all the wonderful features of a man dedicated to the unity of klal Yisrael, to the unity of the Jewish people and to the centrality of the State of Israel as the Jewish homeland."

killed, and continues: "The five million Jews who may still be alive in Nazi-occupied territory are threatened with total extermination under the terms of an official order by Hitler calling for the complete annihilation of Jews in Europe by 31 December 1942."

It went on to inform Roosevelt that "centres have been established in various parts of eastern Europe for the scientific and cold-blooded mass murder of Jews.

"Polish Christian workers, eyewitnesses, have confirmed reports that concrete buildings on the former Russian frontiers are used by the Germans as gas chambers in which thousands of Jews have been put to death."

The memorandum also specifically informed Roosevelt: "The slaughter of trainloads of Jewish adults and children in great crematoriums at Ozwiencim [Auschwitz] near Krakow is confirmed by eyewitnesses in reports which recently reached Jerusalem."

The document was discovered by doctoral student Barbara Rogers at the British Public Record Office when she was researching the British government's response to the Holocaust.

"This is the only document to prove beyond question that the British government and President Roosevelt knew the true role that Auschwitz-Birkenau played in the Final Solution at the time," she said. "The question is, why didn't they disclose it?"

Several explanations have been offered for Britain's apparent attempt to conceal early information about Nazi atrocities against Jews: The British were concerned that the release of information would compromise their successful code-breaking operation, which allowed them to intercept German communications; they feared a flood of emigration by European Jews to Palestine; and they were anxious to avoid a popular backlash if they were perceived to be fighting a "Jewish war."

Hello! How are ya'? What's cookin'?

I HAVE A NAME! Call me "Struby" the Pickle Guy!

To celebrate its 70th Anniversary, Strub's embarked on a nationwide search for the perfect name for me, known until now simply as "The Pickle Guy". Sheri Godawa of Courtice, ON (near Toronto) nominated the winning name and was drawn from 12 others who also submitted the name Struby. Sheri is still deciding what flavours of pickles she will choose for her pickle lover's prize, which includes a jar a week for a year. The others who submitted Struby received Strub's prize packs.

Honourable Mentions for my moniker were: Cool Hand Cuke, Dillenium, Baby Dill Spice, Dilly Brinowitz, Dilly The Kid and Strubinsky.

The Strub family really had a great time looking over all the entries. The year has been full of celebrations and finally giving me a name will be a lasting tribute to what Sophie and Michael Strub started back in 1929.

Another exciting 70th Anniversary initiative has been the launch of the Strub's web site. It's a place where we can share some of the fun trivia and recipes I've collected over the years. The Strub web site contains full contest results and will soon feature a North America Pickle Store Locator.

Syrian president reported to be in poor health

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syrian President Hafez Assad's health has recently deteriorated, although he still rules the country, the chief of IDF intelligence, Maj.-Gen. Amos Malka, told the cabinet last week. Malka did not provide a medical diagnosis of Assad's illness.

According to Malka, some think that Assad does not wish to open negotiations with Israel because of his illness; he fears that Syria would find itself in a dangerous situation if the talks drag on. He is, therefore, willing to start a dialogue only if his demands are met in advance.

Malka added that Assad was awaiting the recovery of his foreign minister, Farouk a-Shara, who underwent open heart surgery last week, to examine the possibility of renewing talks with Israel. However, Syria is only willing to make peace "on its own conditions," which, according to the intelligence evaluation, include an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights to the June 4, 1967 lines; security arrangements with an element of symmetry; continued Syrian control of Lebanon; and U.S. financial aid.

According to Malka, the harsh stance presented by Syria as a condition for renewing the talks with Israel has several causes:

• Assad cares about his personal prestige and does not wish to appear as giving in to Israel.
• Syria is competing for the leadership of the Arab world and must maintain its national pride.
• Syria fears undermining its interests in Lebanon.

Malka said that the Syrian regime is stable, and that Assad's son, Bashar, has a good chance of succeeding his father, "but as is always the case in the Arab world, everything is subject to change." According to Malka, the power struggles between Bashar and the factions loyal to Rifat Assad, the president's brother, "are under control" and do not endanger stability in Syria.

Participants in the meeting understood from Malka's report that he believed it impossible to reach a separate arrangement in Lebanon independent of an overall agreement with Syria.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak promised the ministers that programs for the army pullback from Lebanon will be presented and discussed in the next cabinet meeting.

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz spoke on strategic threats to Israel. He said the main threat is posed by ground-to-ground missiles, mainly from Syria.

Rabin's assassin excommunicated

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – A group of 54 Orthodox rabbis in Israel has excommunicated the assassin of Yitzhak Rabin.

Last Thursday's ruling, which came prior to the fourth anniversary of the Nov. 4, 1995 assassination, bars Jews from visiting Yigal Amir in prison, talking with him or writing to him. Prison personnel and Amir's family are exempt from the edict.

A statement issued by the rabbis declared their "shock and disgust at [Amir's] impertinent attempt to present such a heinous murder as if it were done in the name of the Torah and in the service of the people and land of Israel."

At his trial, Amir refused to express regret for his actions, saying they were justified by Jewish law. Amir is serving a life sentence for the murder.

The rabbi who initiated the action, Rabbi Naftali Rothenberg of the Har Adar settlement, said he expected more rabbis to sign the document. He added that all ethnic groups and streams in religious Zionism are represented among the signatories.

The paper said rabbis from five Jewish settlements were among those who signed. Jewish settlers were some of the strongest opponents of Rabin's peace efforts with the Palestinians.

Rabbi Binyamin Lau, nephew of Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, also signed the decree.

The ban will remain in effect until Amir, who is Orthodox, repents for the assassination.

Amir's mother derided the decree.

"My son is alone in a jail cell. With whom is he to conduct a minyan?" Geula Amir said.

"It's a joke. Nobody listens to the rabbis," she added.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 11

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak approved building 2,600 new apartments in West Bank communities.

• Israel barred entry of 26 Irish and Romanian Christians it suspects are members of an apocalyptic group. Officials feared the group had planned to commit a millennium-related act of violence.

Oct. 12

• Citing the terms of an agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, the Supreme Court ruled against a trial for the mastermind of the 1985 hijacking of the cruise ship Achille Lauro in which wheelchair-bound Leon Klinghoffer was killed.

Oct. 13

• Settlers agreed not to block the evacuation of 12 outposts the government has declared illegal. Barak originally called for the dismantling of 15, but lowered the number after settlers agreed to back off of earlier threats to fight the action. Justice Minister Yossi Beilin said the compromise had set a precedent. "This is the first time that settlements will be removed by agreement with settlers, not in confrontation with them," he said.

Oct. 14

• Khaled Zuabi of Nazareth, an Israeli-Arab lawyer, was elected to the second most important position in the Israeli Bar Association.

• The Palestinian Authority apologized to Israel for an incident last weekend in which Palestinian police detained and beat three Israeli soldiers on leave in Bethlehem.

Oct. 15

• Security officials released 151 Palestinian prisoners. Among them are 10 members of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

• The driver of the bus that overturned last weekend in the north, killing 16 people and injuring about 40 others, lacked sufficient experience and training to cope with the road conditions he encountered, according to a commission of enquiry.

Greek shul rededication marred by no-worship order

By JEAN COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ATHENS — The historic Etz Hayim Synagogue that was destroyed during World War II, was rededicated last week on the island of Crete.

But the festive ceremonies were marred when a local Greek official asked that Jews refrain from worshipping at the synagogue.

The request came in a letter from the head of the prefecture of the port city of Hania, G. Katsanevakis, asking Greece's Central Board of Jewish Communities to "do away with the religious ceremonies" at the synagogue because no Jews currently live in the city.

In 1944, the 300 Jews living in Hania were deported to Auschwitz, but died when an Allied bomb sunk the transport ship. Their deaths ended a more than 2,000-year Jewish presence on Crete.

The president of the central board, Moses Constantinis, reacted angrily to the letter from Katsanevakis, and gave the immediate and very clear reply that in no way would the religious portion of the dedication ceremonies be cancelled.

In his letter, Katsanevakis said that although he does not object to the restoration of the synagogue, no religious services should be held there.

He cited a 1938 law that a house of worship cannot operate unless there are 50 worshippers. Katsanevakis wrote the letter in response to an invitation from the central board to attend the ceremonies.

In an interview with a local television station, Constantinis described the law as "fascist," noting that it was created during the reign of dictator John Metaxa.

Hania's Bishop Irineos, who sided with Katsanevakis in opposing the services, contacted the Ministry of Religion and Education to enlist its support in their cause.

But Religion Minister Gerassimos Arsenis backed the Jewish community and sent a warm message that he asked be read during the dedication ceremonies, which went ahead with the participation of Greek officials and Jewish communal leaders from Greece, the United States, Europe and Israel.

Torah scrolls were installed in the synagogue as part of Shabbat services and the official opening was held the next day. It included a service in memory of the Jews of Crete.

According to tradition, the synagogue was originally a Venetian church that was destroyed by pirates. It was given to the Jewish community in 1645.

The synagogue, which will be used as a centre for cultural events, is now the only monument testifying to the Jewish presence in Crete. The first mention of the Jewish community of Crete, one of the oldest in Greece, dates back to Alexander the Great.

In 1996, with the support of the World Monuments Fund, Greece's Jewish community launched a campaign to restore the synagogue.

The New York-based Ronald S. Lauder Foundation and the Greek Ministry of Culture were among those giving funds for the restoration project.

Fresh water reserves discovered

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Reserves of fresh water equaling some 10 percent of Israel's present annual consumption have recently been discovered in coastal and mountain aquifers.

The reserves, constituting some 150 million cubic metres of water, would allow for a significant increase in the quantity of fresh water that Israel pumps from its aquifers without exceeding the "red lines" for overuse. This would ease the water crisis that the country is experiencing.

Some of the new reserves, however, are known to be unrenewable.

Water Commissioner Meir Ben Meir said that since he hadn't been as panicky as others in the past, he was not yet euphoric about the new discovery.

"When we receive the full results, we'll act accordingly," he said.

Power of attorney may not protect your Florida assets

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A legal expert on power of attorney advises people to prepare for the future.

Power of attorney is the written authority for someone to act on your behalf in the event of an illness or accident, Thornhill-based lawyer Barry Fish explained.

"A will protects you if you die. You're not protected if you're incapacitated."

Fish stressed that you should only give power of attorney to someone with whom you have "a loving and trusting relationship." He said there are various types of power of attorney in Canada – procedures differ in Quebec – and people with assets in Florida should be aware that power of attorney in Canada is not necessarily applicable in that state.

He recommends an encompassing power of attorney over property rather than one that is limited in any manner. As well, he points out that many powers of attorney are drafted in such a manner that they are contingent on proving mental incapacity, which is often is difficult to prove.

If someone with power of attorney tries to sell a mutual fund or stock, a clerk or registrar of the stock may not accept the power of attorney contingent on incapacity, Fish said. "If it's a physical ailment like ALS or multiple sclerosis, power of attorney contingent on incapacity will be challenged."

A legal delay can be costly, he added. "If someone can't sign because of the physical disability of getting to the office and they're holding mutual funds that are dropping in value, how can they sell?

"Investments are time-driven. When you want to bail out in October, you're not going to be happy to have the transaction completed in June. That's why you want the power of attorney to flow quickly without question. That is one of the benefits of encompassing power of attorney."

Fish said that if someone in Ontario is diagnosed with "mental incapacity" and there's no power of attorney, the government steps in to take over management of all assets, including businesses, until the family files a detailed management plan with the office of the Public Guardian and Trustee for approval. Over and above the inconvenience, applicants must also pay a $400 fee, he added.

Fish has drafted encompassing power of attorney kits, as have other lawyers who specialize in this area.

To avoid government intervention, Fish said, assets should not be specified in a power of attorney document. "The only way the government will back off, is if the power of attorney is over all your assets. That's why we've described the document as encompassing."

In Quebec, where encompassing power of attorney is not applicable, there is a legal distinction between power of attorney and a mandate, which are two different documents, Fish noted.

"To be covered in Quebec people should get both. Power of attorney cannot survive the onset of mental incapacity, while a mandate is contingent on mental incapacity."

Should someone become incapacitated in Florida, it's necessary to have a document called durable power of attorney, which appoints a representative to look after a family member's affairs. It's similar to an encompassing power of attorney, Fish said.

The durable power of attorney also allows you to appoint a representative to consent to medical treatment. This document is also necessary for access to Florida assets, should a person become incapacitated, he noted.

"Without it, families will need to get a court-appointed representative to look after your property there."

Fish cautioned, however, to take care not to inadvertently revoke documents applicable in Canada while protecting assets in Florida.

ZANY MUSICAL REVUE

The Phantom of the Opera, Monica Lewinsky, Julio Iglesias, Kate Smith, Willie Nelson, and a host of other look-alike celebrities sang, danced and delighted those who attended the three sold-out performances at a fast-paced musical review presented recently by the Seniors Performing Group.

The amateur group of 24 60-plus women and one man (he plays the piano), had the audience at Earl Bales Community Centre singing, laughing and showing their appreciation for the variety show. Dedicating the performance to the International Year of the Older Person, the second annual Zany Musical Review, which was written and directed by Dorothy Little, was an example of what seniors can accomplish and how much enjoyment they have in working together.

Shirley Katz, administrative coordinator of the Seniors Performing Group and the MC for the show—who did a Judy Garland impersonation— said enthusiasm is the prime requirement for the members. "We have become more enthusiastic than ever and the bond between the members has become stronger."

Film explores girl's split identity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Judging by Emporte-Moi (Set Me Free), Lea Pool is a filmmaker of formidable talents. This coming-of-age movie, set mainly in Montreal in 1963, glides over the surface of its topic without taking a single fall.

Emporte-moi, now playing in Toronto, is autobiographical. It is inspired by Pool's own life as the child of a mixed marriage.

It revolves around Hanna, a quiet but feisty 13-year-old girl trying to find her footing in a perplexing, sometimes cruel and brutal world.

Torn between her immigrant father's Jewish background and her Quebecois mother's Catholic faith, Hanna suffers from a split identity.

David Cohn, her Polish dad, is a struggling poet who can barely eke out a living, and he gets upset when his children show no interest in Israel.

Hanna's mother, a worker in a leather coat factory whose relationship with Hanna and her older brother Paul is much closer than that of her husband's, patiently puts up with his periodic rages.

Emporte-moi, which Pool dedicates to her mother and daughter, goes to great lengths to highlight the emotional and spiritual chasm separating Cohn from his family.

After Hanna returns from her grandmother's house in the country, Cohn asks, "Did she make you say grace?"

BBC doc From Bitter Earth examines Holocaust art

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Holocaust produced a peculiar genre – drawings, paintings and woodcuts of the unprecedented horrors the Nazis inflicted upon European Jewry.

Jewish artists in ghettos, concentration camps, hiding places and deep forest glades recorded these atrocities for posterity. More than 30,000 of their works survived.

They painted, drew and etched in a variety of styles ranging from expressionism to impressionism. Their works had a single quality in common. They were uniformly sombre, as befitted their subjects.

This little-known facet and footnote of the Holocaust is thoroughly explored by a dark BBC documentary, From Bitter Earth – Artists of the Holocaust, scheduled to be broadcast by Vision TV on Wednesday, Oct. 27 at 9 p.m.

Some Germans were in fear of these intrepid artists, for they knew they could expose Nazi crimes to the civilized world.

As a result, many of the artists were ruthlessly murdered, even as thousands of their drawings and paintings came through the war unscathed.

Other Germans, however, exploited the artists for their own ends. At the Terezin concentration camp, for instance, Jewish artists were pressed into creating cheerful murals to fool a naive Red Cross inspector.

In this sorrowful film, artists who lived through the Holocaust recall those bitter, hellish days with a mixture of indignation and resignation.

One woman, fortunate enough to have been given space for a studio, had a conversation with a German officer one day.

As they discussed the finer points of art, German policemen rounded up and deported a batch of Jewish children while their parents were at work.

"You can't imagine the crying and the shouting," she said, referring to the parents' response.

More often than not, the artists had difficulty finding paint, brushes, paper and pencils.

But somehow, they scraped together the necessary materials and produced an unrivalled record of man's inhumanity to man.

'Degenerate' art collage on display

By HEATHER SOLOMON

MONTREAL — His art would have been considered "Entartete Kunst, modern works that the Third Reich branded decadent and destroyed," says artist John A. Schweitzer.

Happily, however, Schweitzer's current series, 24 collages under the umbrella title The Arcadian Suite, are intact and on display in the gallery of Toronto's Goethe-Institut, 163 King St. W., Sept. 22 to Oct. 30.

The Montreal artist's career has encompassed everything from making art to writing to curating to dealing in art, a skill he honed in '80s when he owned his Galerie John A. Schweitzer.

That was also the decade when he began to create collages in the vein of his "spiritual father," the American abstract expressionist, Robert Motherwell, he says.

Lately, Schweitzer's visually arresting compositions of paper ephemera are combined with found objects like wood and broken porcelain.

The Arcadian Suite is based on the 24 Roman Elegies written by German poet-novelist-playwright Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, poems published as a lyrical cycle by Goethe's friend Friedrich von Schiller in 1795, which relate both Goethe's passion and his disappointment during a return visit to a decaying Rome.

Schweitzer draws parallels between Goethe's Rome and 20th-century civilizations in decline.

Parallels

Schweitzer titled the series The Arcadian Suite, in reference to the spoiling of what Goethe once considered an idyllic setting – Arcadia in the Greek Peloponnesus was a shepherd's haven used by poets in their writings as a symbol of innocence and virtuous living.

The series is Schweitzer's homage to his favorite literary giant who was born 250 years ago this year.

The artist reads Goethe in High German and delights in demonstrating the writer's relevance today through his own visual oeuvre, completed over a two-year period.

Schweitzer found his medium as a collage artist ideal for the subject, because Goethe held back four of his more risqué elegies (they were released in 1914, 82 years after his death) in an act of self-censorship.

Schweitzer points out that collage is also an act of censorship and even concealment. The artist purposefully employed censorship on his creations through overlays and by working his collages to the size and color of two dozen existing frames. These he acquired at tag sales or from rummage. Some are gorgeous. Some are kitsch.

He tossed the frames' original contents except for one, a needlepoint of a Eugene Delacroix portrait of a woman that Schweitzer designates as Faustina, a Goethe heroine.

He overlaid the needlepoint with a shard of decayed wood at Faustina's throat to suggest the rape of Rome and modern civilization. A black serpentine line, the snake, symbolizes Goethe's themes of desire and decadence, and a $10,000 Monopoly bill alludes to the mistress Goethe kept.

In another collage, the salvaged lining from a 1930s trunk found on a Paris street coaxes thoughts of Goethe's trip from the dark north to sun-filled Rome, as do the stripes on flattened shopping bags, denoting the journey from points A to B.

Schweitzer also incorporates personal mail via stamps, stationery and envelopes that suggest travel. He adds meaningful marks to the collages in acrylic.

Young actor puts on glowing performance

Sensing that Hanna and Paul couldn't care less about a radio report which describes the latest armed clash pitting Israel against Syria, he lashes out. "Damn gentiles!" he shouts. "Why aren't you interested in the land of your ancestors?"

To any viewer, the answer is self-evident: Hanna has not been raised with a Jewish consciousness. She attends a French Catholic school, and uses her mother's surname, Riel.

Hanna, however, is sensitive to racist slights. A classmate, having accused Jews of being self-pitying, calls Hanna a "damn Jewish bastard." Unfazed by the verbal onslaught, Hanna rips into her by bringing up the subject of Nazi concentration camps.

For all its allusions to Judaism, Israel and the Holocaust, Emporte-moi largely dwells on Hanna's development as a strong and assertive person. It also focuses on her friendships with Paul, an empathetic teacher (resembling a character in a Jean-Luc Godard film who inspires Hanna), and a sensual girl named Laura.

Deftly directed by Pool, Emporte-moi coaxes a glowing performance from newcomer Karine Vanasse, who plays Hanna. Vanasse, who lights up the screen, has a smile which can melt icebergs.

She is ably supported by Miki Manojiovic, the father; Pascale Bussieres, the mother; Nancy Huston, the teacher; Alexandre Merineau, the brother; and Charlotte Christeler, the friend.

The film is beautifully shot, with the best scene being the one in which Hanna connects emotionally with her mother on a skating rink. It is a masterful moment.

In her capable hands, Pool's movie is a piercing portrait of a precocious teenager who learns that freedom and responsibility are inextricably intertwined.

TVO Highlights: TVOntario's upcoming schedule includes the following programs of special interest:

• On Nov. 11 and Nov. 14, Camera on Canada presents Charlie Grant's War, focusing on the little-known story of a Canadian diamond merchant's successful efforts to save hundreds of Jewish lives during World War II. Described as "a Canadian Wallenberg," Grant survived the war and died in Toronto in 1980. Made in the 1980s, the film was written by Anna Sandor and directed by Martin Lavut.

• Sunday Nov. 7, 7 p.m. Richard Ouzounian interviews Toronto theatre impresario David Mirvish.

• Monday Nov. 29, 10:30 p.m., the documentary The Power Within — Healing Through Prayer is a multi-denominational look at how prayer can improve health. Produced by the Anglican Church, the film includes testimony from Rabbi Ronald Weiss.

Film Debated: Roberto Benigni's Oscar-winning film Life Is Beautiful provoked a wide range of esthetic questions about the representation of the Holocaust in art. For example: Is it appropriate to treat the Holocaust in comic form?

The closing program in this year's Holocaust Education Week (Oct. 28 to Nov. 9) brings together two experts on the Holocaust in cinema, Prof. Stuart Liebman of the City University of New York, and Prof. Judy Doneson, author of The Holocaust in American Film. Liebman and Doneson hold diametrically opposed views about Benigni's film, which they will voice in the program titled Life Is Beautiful: Debate and Discussion.

Nov. 9, 8 p.m. Beth Tzedec Congregation, Toronto. Admission free. This is one of many programs in the 10-day event. For more information, contact the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, 635-2883, ext. 301.

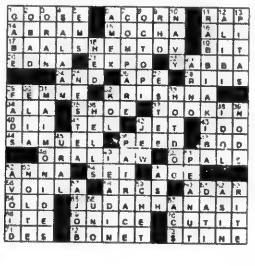
ANSWERS TO THIS WEEK'S CROSSWORD PUZZLE.



Play brings Yiddish icons to life

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The stars and the songs that turned Yiddish Theatre into the forerunner of today's smash musical shows on Broadway are coming to Toronto.

On Second Avenue, the Saidye Bronfman Yiddish Theatre of Montreal production that played to sold-out houses in Montreal and Vienna, is at Leah Posluns Theatre Oct. 30 and 31, with a gala reception on opening night in aid of Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto.

The cast of 31, a crew of 25, a vanload of scenery and props, and seven musicians will be here for only three week-end performances, because the actors have to be back at work on Monday morning. (They all have day jobs.)

Created by Zalman Mlotek and Moishe Rosenfeld, On Second Avenue brings the icons of Yiddish Theatre alive – Avraham Goldfadden, the father of Yiddish Theatre, played by Sam Mitnick, Menashe Skulnik, Molly Picon, Jenny Goldstein, Mihel Rosenberg, and the dance team of Siegel and Schwartz, among many others.

It is a tuneful recital of the history of Yiddish theatre from the taverns of eastern Europe in the 1890s to the days when it finally flickered out in the theatres of New York, Toronto and other cities.

In a way, the company founded by Dora Wasserman and now directed by her daughter, Bryna, is enjoying a homecoming. Many of the cast have close relatives here. Helen Zukerman and Eda Zimler, the partners of Olive Eye Productions, which is bringing On Second Avenue here, have special ties. Zukerman's late husband, Barry, was a performer with the troupe, as was Zimler, who had Dora Wasserman as a teacher.

The cast has members of two generations in it, including Aron Gonshor (who plays Menashe Skulnik) and his son, Benji. Miriam Samuels keeps the narration flowing as the doyenne, Ida Kaminska.

Since each scene has a costume change, so many sets are needed that it will take 16 hours, from 8 a.m. to midnight, for the "techies" to mount the production at Leah Posluns. This includes building a scaffolding above the stage so that the seven-piece band led by Max Sherman can play without overpowering the singers.

Though On Second Avenue is mostly in Yiddish, those who are Yiddishly challenged will have the benefit of surtitles in English.

Bryna Wasserman said it was her mother, Dora, who taught her the best way to get things done was to go out and do it, obstacles or no. Her mother, who is in a wheelchair, is coming to Toronto with the rest of the company.

For information and tickets, call 416-324-9413.

Michelle Heisler, Sam Mitnick and Karen Karpman are part of a cast of 31 in On Second Avenue, a recital of Yiddish Theatre history.

Little kids just love the singing, strutting cowboy

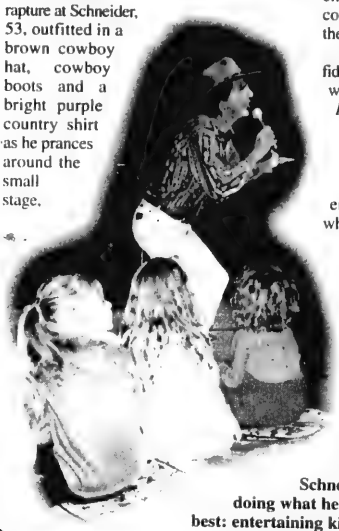
By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bob Schneider struts across the stage like a cowboy.

Pursing his lips together, Jim Carrey style, he contorts his face into a ridiculous grin.

And the kids love it.

About 15 preschool and elementary school children stare in rapture at Schneider, 53, outfitted in a brown cowboy hat, cowboy boots and a bright purple country shirt as he prances around the small stage, stopping occasionally to strum his guitar.



Bob Schneider doing what he does best: entertaining kids. [Simone Joseph photo]

One particularly delighted youngster throws back her head and starts to giggle.

On this Sunday afternoon in the brightly-lit Solar Stage Children's Theatre in North York, Schneider is practising a craft he has honed for 18 years – entertaining children.

The songwriter and musician was performing numbers from his most recent children's album Country Kiddie Boogie, a collection of children's songs with a western theme.

The album combines boot-stomping, fiddle-racing songs like Sing a Country Song, with soulful, mellow tunes like Listen to the Raindrops.

Some songs have obvious messages. Be-Believe In You, for example, assures children they can achieve if only they believe in themselves. Give a Little Cuddle encourages kids to cuddle or pat a friend who is feeling blue.

His performances include young background singers dubbed the Rainbow Kids because of the multi-ethnic nature of past performers. The groups sometimes include children with developmental or physical disabilities.

Rainbow Kids are chosen from schools in the cities where Schneider performs.

"It's rewarding and fulfilling... I've had the opportunity to work with all kinds of kids," Schneider says.

The experience of being a Rainbow Kid or being chosen to sing in front of an audience often boosts children's self-esteem, Schneider says.

"I met parents years after, saying ...this kid had just come from Germany or something, and he was very upset, he wouldn't speak, he had no friends; and from that experience [being a Rainbow Kid], he just blossomed. That's happened a lot," Schneider says.

Schneider began writing songs for children when he worked as a teacher's aide at a North York summer school in the late '70s.

Most of the students were in English As A Second Language (ESL) classes or had come from countries where the English dialect is different, he says.

Instead of singing traditional songs with them, like Old Macdonald Had A Farm, he made up songs with the kids.

One of his most successful and well-loved songs, Listen to the Water, was created on a field trip that summer.

The class was walking near a stream, which Schneider thinks was the Don River.

Another teacher's aide asked whether he knew any songs about the water, but he didn't have his guitar.

"For some reason, I just sang 'Listen to the Water' – it just came right out," he says.

When they got back to the classroom, Schneider asked the children what they had seen by the waterside and incorporated their observations into the song. Together, they also made up actions.

The song has been so popular that Schneider continues performing it at all his shows, says his manager, Hallary Dworet, who has co-written some of his songs.

After that summer stint, Schneider was asked to help teach children in ESL programs twice a week in the fall, writing songs with them to help them learn English.

Parents and teachers started asking for his music on tape and Schneider decided to record the songs, many of which he had created with the children.

"It became clear from the feedback I was getting from teachers and parents there was something pretty special going on with what I was doing. All the stuff I do with kids is original music," he says.

This creative approach to songwriting paid off: In the early '80s, Schneider won a Juno award for his second album When You Dream A Dream.

Since then, he has produced five albums and now entertains in concert halls, schools and malls, and sometimes at conventions and corporate parties.

Schneider often performs in the United States and he will be touring California schools for three weeks.

He will return to Canada for more concerts, Dworet says, but the dates are not yet set.

When he does come back, he will undoubtedly once again captivate his audience as he has done at the Solar Stage, where his performance comes to an end with Just Friends, the last song in his album.

The children are now quiet. Schneider sings softly: "Sharing a daydream/ Sharing a song/ Makes you feel happy/ Makes you feel strong."

He approaches the audience and gives the children high fives.

Barbados: A wonderful place for tans, beaches — and synagogues?

By HENRY SREBRNIK
Special to The CJN

Very few Jewish visitors travel to Barbados in order to see a synagogue, no matter how old or lovely it is.

When the winds begin to swirl snow into foot-high drifts and temperatures fall below zero a few months from now, it will be the tropical sun, white sandy beaches, and the excellent food and entertainment at posh hotels, that beckon the winter-weary tourist to this lovely Caribbean island.

However, as any guide book will indicate, there is also much to explore, on land and in the warm turquoise waters that surround the island.

For those who want to rent a car to see the sights, the whole island is just 34 kilometres long and 23 kilometres wide and the roads, while sometimes poorly marked, are paved.

Pay a visit to Harrison's Cave, where a little train transports you underground through a maze of caverns, springs and waterfalls, encased by crystallized limestone created over thousands of years.

Visit Welchman Hall Gully, a fascinating primeval rain forest with 200 species of tropical plants. Tour the Barbados Wildlife Reserve at the northern tip of the island, with its Barbados green monkeys, tortoises, and other animals and birds. Join an island safari and hang on for dear life as your Land Rover hurtles through sugar cane fields and up the steep cliffs along the rugged and mountainous eastern side of the island.

Go diving, swimming and snorkeling while cruising on a catamaran sailing out of Bridgetown harbor. And journey in the 65-foot long Atlantis submarine out to the coral reefs where, at 150 feet below sea level, the ocean teems with marine life, including sea turtles, barracudas and all types of colorful tropical fish.

But even if you do little else but bask in the sun, don't pass up a visit to the synagogue in the heart of Bridgetown, the bustling, pleasant – and very safe – capital of this democratic and vibrant country.

Inside the Nidhe Israel Synagogue.

Located at Synagogue Lane, near James Street and Magazine Lane, the current building dates from 1833. It replaced an earlier structure, built in the 17th century, which was destroyed by a hurricane.

A Jewish community has been a part of Barbados since 1654, when Sephardim arrived in this British colony after fleeing Recife, Brazil, following its recapture from the Dutch by the Portuguese (and their Inquisition). They brought with them their skills and knowledge of cane sugar culture and became prominent members of the island's commercial class.

David de Mercado developed a new type of sugar mill which catapulted Barbados into the world market as a leading producer of sugar and rum. One of the main thoroughfares in colonial Bridgetown was named Jew Street. Still an important shopping venue, it is now called Swan Street, and is located a block from the synagogue.

But by the early 20th century most Jews had left Barbados for greener pastures and the synagogue fell into disrepair and was finally sold. In 1934 the Torahs were sent to Bevis Marks, the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue in London, the beautiful chandeliers were sold to a Delaware museum, and the furniture was auctioned off.

For the next 50 years the building would house offices. It was finally acquired in 1982 by the Barbados National Trust, which resolved to rededicate the structure as a Jewish house of worship as well as a museum.

Restoration of the synagogue began in the mid-1980s, and the Barbadian postal authorities issued a set of four commemorative stamps to mark the occasion. The refurbishment of the interior is not yet complete: On the day we visited last spring, workers were still painting and putting some finishing touches on the walls.

The exterior is, however, finished, and an outside stairway again leads to the women's gallery upstairs, in a style typical of West Indian Sephardi synagogues. Some of the headstones in the two cemeteries adjoining the synagogue are over 300 years old, with inscriptions in Portuguese as well as Hebrew. For any Jewish traveller to Barbados, the Bridgetown synagogue is well worth the extra effort.

Bone marrow donation information meeting planned

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jeffrey Bornstein and Jason Rosen don't seem to have much in common.

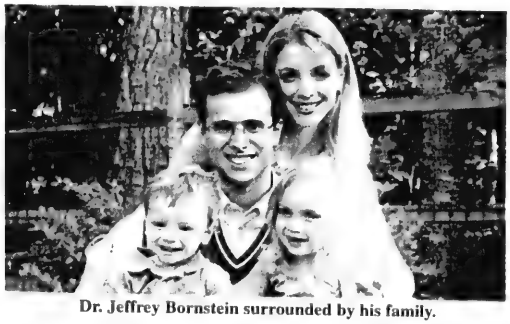
The Montreal-born Bornstein is a doctor, married, with two children. Rosen is a university student from Toronto.

But the two men have a serious medical problem in common. Both have leukemia, and they both need a bone marrow transplant to survive.

Once again, members of Toronto's Jewish community are being asked to come out to be tested as potential donors for Bornstein, Rosen, or any other person who may need a bone-marrow transplant.

Those interested in helping are asked to come to Beth Tikvah synagogue on Oct. 25, at 8 p.m. for an information meeting about the National and International Bone Marrow Registries, and to learn more about bone marrow donation itself.

Jason Rosen



Dr. Jeffrey Bornstein surrounded by his family.

After the meeting, those who wish to be tested will be given appointments at MDS Labs, which has offices throughout the city. Results will be given to the Canadian and international bone marrow registries.

This procedure is different from what was done at previous mass screenings when attending an information meeting was not mandatory. The procedure changed because a noticeable number of people called to come for the second round of tests had changed their minds about being donors.

The information meeting is being held under the auspices of Jewish Women International (JWI) and Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Lynn Sokoloff, a member of the national executive of JWI, and a former neighbor and friend of the Bornstein family when she and her family lived in Montreal, is co-ordinating the screening.

When she heard about Bornstein – he grew up with her son – she knew she had to do something concrete to help.

"It was a friend helping a friend. I realized it could strike any of us or our loved ones," she recently told The CJN.

There has already been a screening in Montreal – at Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard-Des-Ormeaux – which drew 2,300 people, Sokoloff said.

Bornstein, 29, is a transplant hepatologist. Members of his family have been tested, but are not suitable donors. Without a bone-marrow transplant, he may die in three years and with it, he has the chance for a normal life.

Jason Rosen, 20, was supposed to start studying political science at Concordia University in Montreal. Instead, he is in the hospital, enduring his second round of chemotherapy. He, too, needs a bone-marrow transplant if he is to survive acute myelogenous leukemia.

His aunt, Marsha Rosen, spoke about Jason. "He is such a sweet person, always smiling. He is the apple of his parents' Allen and Marilyn's eyes, and his sister Jessica's too."

Jason likes music, going to the family cottage, communing with nature, golf and swimming. He loves his dog, a golden Lab named Cato.

Ironically, the father of the young man who was supposed to be Rosen's roommate also needed a bone-marrow transplant. Through the International Bone Marrow Registry, a donor was found for him in the Netherlands.

For more information, call Sokoloff, 905-881-1337; Jewish Women International, 416-630-9313; or Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 416-221-3433.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I always hear people talking about getting more vitamin C in their diets. Where is vitamin C found and what does it do?

A. Vitamin C is an antioxidant that may have protective properties against cancers, cataracts and heart disease. The recommended amount for adults daily (RDA) is 60 mg.

Here are some foods that are very good sources of vitamin C: red pepper – 4 ounces contain 215 mg; 1 cup orange juice – 125 mg; 1 cup apple juice – 105 mg; 1 cup fresh strawberries – 85 mg.

Q. I have an 11-month-old son and I know I should be helping him make the transition to table food, but I am unsure about which foods are still unsafe for him at this age?

A. By their first birthday, children should be fully on table food. Here are the foods that you have to worry about: Honey should not be introduced until the first birthday because of a risk of food poisoning in small infants. Food must be cut up properly to eliminate the risk of choking (i.e., grapes, hot dogs, etc.) Do not give large peas, nuts, popcorn, or other similar foods until about age three.

The only other food group to watch is nuts. Most pediatricians suggest waiting to introduce nuts until age two, although the Canadian Pediatric Association says it's safe after one (not whole nuts though due to choking risk). Unless you have a family history of food allergies, all foods are safe to introduce at this stage.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist, specializing in pediatric and adult nutrition in Toronto. If you have any nutrition questions, send them to The CJN.

Israel & the Jewish World

Rabbi's task is to build bridges within Israel

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

The inclusion of Meimad, the small left-leaning Orthodox party, in the list headed by Ehud Barak in the last Israeli elections was an imaginative attempt to persuade religious Israelis to vote for the political centre.

Profile

Barak's victory obligated him to find a place in his cabinet for Rabbi Michael Melchior, the leader of Meimad, even though the party's impact on the Israeli electorate seems to have been small.

To make room for the newcomer, while keeping other coalition promises, Barak had to expand his cabinet. But he had no real portfolio to give to Rabbi Melchior, so he took him into his office and made him, de facto, Israel's first minister for Jewish Affairs.

It is a most welcome move. Though by all accounts, Rabbi Melchior has neither staff nor budget, his brief is to liaise with Diaspora Jewry and to build bridges within Israel between all streams and denominations in Judaism.

It is high time that the government of Israel paid attention, even in this modest way, to the relationship between Jews and Jews. In the long run, it is likely to be more decisive for the future of the Jewish state even than peace between Jews and Arabs.

Rabbi Melchior is sensitive to the challenge. What programs may not be able to achieve, his personality and passion may accomplish. Few, if any, Israeli politicians have such intimate experience of both Israel and Jewish life in the Diaspora.

As a brilliant graduate of Yeshivat Hakotel, one of the prestigious institutions of higher rabbinic learning in Israel, and as a meticulously observant Jew, Rabbi Melchior is rooted in Israel and has the necessary credentials in the Orthodox community.

As a champion for human rights in Israel and elsewhere, he is respected by secularists with whom he has co-operated in many campaigns. As an intelligent and mature human being he knows how to get along with people of all faiths and none.

Perhaps his greatest asset is his appreciation of non-Orthodox religious movements. Though he strongly disagrees with them, he understands them and accepts their leaders' integrity and commitment to the Jewish people.

He learnt it, as Isaac Bashevis Singer would have put it, "in his father's court." For until his retirement a few years ago, his father, Bent, served as the chief rabbi of Denmark for more than three decades. Himself an Orthodox Jew, he knew that the small community in his country needed an open approach, especially when it came to conversion of non-Jewish spouses.

Michael Melchior

Rabbi Bent Melchior had succeeded his father, Marcus, as chief rabbi. Like Marcus in his time, Bent is today a commanding presence in Danish public life. His is a liberal, deeply religious voice in the nation's debates. He is a staunch and effective defender of Jews and Judaism. But he has also been a passionate critic of reactionary politics in Israel, where many members of his family have settled and where he himself had fought in the 1948 War of Independence.

Rabbi Michael Melchior became the spiritual leader of the Jewish community in Oslo even before he was ordained, and he has retained that position until his election to the Knesset this year. Though for much of that time he has lived in Israel, he is close to his congregation and respected by the Norwegian public.

Rabbi Michael Melchior has participated in many momentous events that linked Norway to the Jewish people, including Elie Wiesel's receipt of the Nobel Peace Prize and the compensation the Norwegian government recently granted its Jewish community for the devastation caused by the Nazi Quisling regime during World War II.

One can only guess that he must have been around at the time of the Oslo accords that gave new impetus to the Israeli-Arab peace process.

His family has not only a distinguished rabbinic record. Many of its members have also been active in political life in Israel and Denmark. Thus his late uncle, Werner David Melchior, worked for many years for Israel's Labor party; his uncle Arne Melchior is a member of the Danish parliament and a former cabinet minister.

Rabbi Michael Melchior seems to have learned much from both the rabbis and the politicians he grew up with. Though only a short time in office, he has already made prudent pronouncements that repudiate the Orthodox demonization of Reform and Conservative Jews. He has also shown great sensitivity to Diaspora concerns about the resurgence of anti-Semitism. And he has made important personal contacts with non-Orthodox spokespersons in Israel and elsewhere.

However, in politics in general and Israeli politics in particular, it is not enough to be qualified and well-intentioned. Given the clout of other forces in the Barak cabinet, it is by no means certain that Rabbi Melchior will be allowed to do his job.

The question is still open whether his appointment is an expedient way of pacifying Meimad or a serious attempt to build bridges in an effort to prevent further fragmentation in the Jewish world.

Hence the importance of Diaspora pressure on Barak not to write out of the script he is now crafting for Israel in the next century one of the brightest and most original members of his cabinet. Hence also the need for Minister Melchior to get to know Jewish communities everywhere. Canada should be high on his list of countries to be visited soon.

Rabbi Dow Marmur is senior rabbi of the Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto. He has known Rabbi Michael Melchior since Melchior's childhood.

Heat turned up in Tel Aviv; beat Maccabi 126–91

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — There was no miracle here in Israel – at least not last week, when the NBA's Miami Heat defeated Maccabi Tel Aviv by a score of 126-91.

The exhibition basketball game was the first between an NBA team and an Israeli team in the Jewish state since Maccabi Tel Aviv defeated the Washington Bullets in 1978.

The high point for the home team came in the first half, when Maccabi tied the score 36-36 in the middle of the second quarter.

The nearly 9,000 spectators packed into the Yad Eliahu stadium were on their feet.

But Heat coach, Pat Riley, returned superstars Tim Hardaway and Alonzo Mourning to the court, and from then on, the only question was what the margin of the Heat victory would be.

The Heat outshot its hosts 55 percent to 35 percent, and outrebounded them, by 66-32. In the final quarter, Riley sent in his bench players, which slightly evened out the game.

'We beat a good team'

At a postgame news conference, Riley said Miami played well, considering that it was an exhibition game.

"We beat a good team, but we had more talent," Riley said. "All we kept hearing before we came was that the Bullets had come here and lost," he added, referring to the 1978 match.

Riley said he was impressed with Maccabi's Nate Huffman, who scored 14 points and pulled down 11 rebounds.

Asked if he thought Huffman had NBA potential, Riley said, "He's just a bit raw, but he's big, smart, mobile and can shoot."

Maccabi coach Pinni Gershon seemed relatively pleased as well.

"It's not so nice to lose by such a wide margin, but it's not terrible. This is one of the best teams in the NBA and could win the championship," he said.

"We saw the differences between the NBA and Europe," but we had a "good performance and the crowd enjoyed it," Gershon said.

Before the game, there was a moment of silence to honor Ted Arison, the Israeli American businessman and founder of the Heat, who recently died in Tel Aviv at the age of 75.

Olympics conflicts resolved

By RUTH KAHANE GOLDBERG
Special to The CJN

SYDNEY, Australia — Unable to change the Sydney 2000 Olympics closing ceremonies scheduled for Rosh Hashanah, Australian Jewish officials have ensured Jewish athletes the right to pray instead of play.

Rosh Hashanah services for athletes and officials will be held at the Olympic Village Multi-Faith Centre as part of a compromise struck with the Olympic organizing committee.

"It was totally inflexible about moving the date of the final ceremonies," says Amanda Gordon, head of the Sydney Olympics Jewish Organizing Committee (SOJOC), vice-president of the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies and member of the multicultural advisory committee to the Sydney Olympics Organizing Committee (SOCOG).

"There is now a general understanding of the importance of Rosh Hashanah replacing the lack of understanding" originally shown, she said.

The appeal to SOCOG for religious consideration began in 1993 when Oct. 1, 2000 was announced as the date of the final ceremonies.

Rabbi Mendel Kastel, Jewish chaplain to the Sydney Olympics and assistant rabbi at the Great Synagogue, says services will be provided for the Israeli team and Jewish athletes and officials from around the world.

They will be held in the Multi-Faith Centre to be built at the Olympic Village, in a large common hall to be equipped for services by the Jewish community. On-site accommodation will be provided for the Jewish chaplain.

In carrying out his role, Rabbi Kastel plans to have a member of his chaplaincy team on duty over the entire Olympic-Paralympic period. An emergency disaster plan has been developed; there are plans to build a sukkah in the Olympic Village.

Sydney synagogues will host Olympic visitors for Rosh Hashanah, and Rabbi Kastel says that the Great Synagogue, a historic landmark located in downtown Sydney, is considering an additional service to accommodate Olympic visitors.

SOJOC is planning a drop-in welcome centre to be run by B'nai Brith. The centre will provide tours of Jewish Sydney and sell kosher meals. It will be situated at the Hakoah Club in Bondi Beach which operates a major Jewish recreation centre. SOJOC also plans to help visitors arrange kosher homes for Shabbat, Rosh Hashanah and Sukkot.

The SOJOC web site at www.join.org.au/sojoc is currently conducting a survey to find out the needs of potential visitors to the Sydney Olympics.

"We are opening up the Sydney Jewish community to the world," says Gordon.

Israel draws Denmark in soccer playoff

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts and Travel Editor

Although Israel's soccer team lost to the much superior Spanish side 3-0 recently, it had enough points to qualify for the playoff round for the 2000 European Cup.

Israel finished second in its group, behind Spain and will now face Denmark in a home/away playoff. The winner advances to next summer's tournament to be held in Belgium and Holland.

Although Denmark won the European Cup in 1994, they haven't been very consistent since then. They beat the Italians in Naples, but in a recent exhibition match they only drew Iran.

Although most betting odds favor Denmark, [they are a technically superior team] don't count the Israelis out. They have done well in the qualifying so far, and have been impressive at home.

Israel will host the first of the two games at the National Stadium in Ramat Gan on Nov. 17. The return match will be played on Nov. 21.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

רומיה ומרבד הקסמים; סיפורי סבתא או סיפור על סבתא...

כמה נחמד לקרוא סיפור שאינו מתיימר להיות בבחינת ספרות זו או אחרת אלא סתם כך, סיפור על סבתא כשהיתה קטנה. ובאמת, כבר מזמן לא היו לנו סיפורי סבתא מוצלחים. ומתי בעצם נכתבה ספרות עברית לילדים מתוך רצון אמיתי לדעת ולזכור חיים שהיו בכפר בפולניה, או ברוסיה או עיראק? על פי רוב, מה שתואר היה שלב העלייה מהנכר והקליטה בארץ ישראל אך לא ממש סיפורים אותנטים על החיים "שם".

מבחינה זו, הספר שלפנינו הוא ייחודי. רומיה ומרבד הקסמים הוא סיפור שסופר לסופרת שמחה סיאני על ידי הוריה חנה וויוסף. שמחה סיפרה אותו לילדיה איריס ואודי והם מספרים את הסיפור לארבעת ילדיהם.

ובכן, רומיה היא ילדה טובה שנולדה בתימן, אחות לששה אחים. רומיה הקסימה את כולם. היא גדלה והיתה לילדה יפה ועליזה. היא גם היתה חרוצה ואהבה לקום מוקדם בבוקר ולעזור לאמא בעבודות הבית והמשק. אך לרומיה היתה בעיה אחת רצינית; היא היתה חסרת סבלנות ונוהגת שלא להקשיב עד סוף המשפט. כך למשל, יום אחד אמרה אמא לרומיה למהר ולטאטא את החדר לפני שאבא ישוב מבית הכנסת ולגרש את הזבובים. אלא שרומיה לא הקשיבה לסוף, ולא שמעה את סיום המשפט: "את הזבובים" והחלה מגרשת את סבתא חנה שישבה על המחצלת ורקמה. כמובן שסבתא חנה נדהמה ונעלבה. ביום אחר אמא בקשה מרומיה להוריד את הכביסה מה... ולא סיימה את המשפט וכבר רומיה מזנקת להוריד את הכביסה מהחבל. אלא שהכביסה עדיין היתה רטובה והאם בעצם רק בקשה להסיר את הכביסה המקופלת מעל למחצלת. לאחר עוד כמה ארועים דומים ומביכים, מזהירה האם את רומיה; "רומיה, אם לא תלמדי להקשיב - יהיו לך הרבה מקרים לא נעימים, ולא רק בבית."

ממש כך!! כמעט... בסוף הסיפור מובטח לנו שיש לסיפור המשך בספר שייצא בקרוב: "רומיה עולה לארץ ישראל."

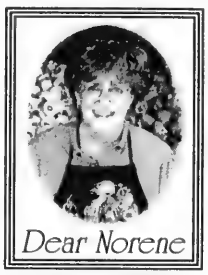
About Food



By NORENE GILLETZ

A frequent question I am asked is "Will it freeze?"

Here are some simple guidelines to post on your freezer door for reference. Read the manufacturer's manual for general information.

Your freezer saves you valuable time in meal preparation and shopping. When you entertain, much of the work can be reduced if you prepare and freeze in advance.

Freezing preserves food in its most natural state but doesn't improve quality. Stock up when prices are low or certain foods are in season. Rotate frozen foods, using the oldest ones first. Although foods may be safe to eat if frozen past the recommended time, taste or texture may be affected.

Wrap foods well before freezing to prevent them from absorbing odors. Use heavy-duty freezer bags, or double-wrap with heavy-duty foil. Squeeze out excess air, as it dries out foods. Avoid surprises – mark packages with contents, quantity and date frozen.

Make double or triple batches of recipes for future meals. Freeze in portions suitable for your family. Pack extra single portions for unexpected company or for quick kid-sized meals. Smaller packages of food freeze and defrost faster than larger ones.

Here's a great trick! Line your casserole dish with heavy-duty foil. Prepare the desired food and freeze it in a foil-lined casserole. When frozen solid, lift the wrapped food from the casserole. Now your casserole is free for everyday use!

When needed, place the frozen food back in the original casserole to defrost. Reheat it in the microwave or oven.

Foods stored in the freezer compartment of the refrigerator cannot be stored as long as foods in an upright or chest freezer because the door is opened more often.

If there's a power failure, don't panic – and don't open the freezer door or precious cold air will escape. If the freezer is fully stocked, contents will remain frozen for at least two days; if half-full, at least one full day. If power remains off longer, place dry ice on top of food.

Frozen food that is completely thawed should be used as soon as possible. If there are still some ice crystals, it can be refrozen, but there could be a change in texture. If frozen raw chicken or meat is defrosted, cook it; then you can refreeze it. Cookies, cakes and breads can be refrozen even if completely thawed. So freeze with ease!

Legacy of Rabin murder: Israelis are still coping

Young and old made their way to Yitzhak Rabin's grave in Jerusalem and to Rabin square in Tel Aviv last week on the fourth anniversary of the assassination of the former prime minister. Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Barak and his wife Nava place a stone on Rabin's grave on Mount Herzl. In the photo on the right we see a young woman seated near the memorial plaque at the spot where Rabin was gunned down in Tel Aviv. Please see editorial on page 8.

'When you meet face to face... all the stigmas are wrong'

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Four years after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, Israelis are still grappling with the social chasm the murder revealed.

In an effort to heal some of those rifts, secular and religious youths attempted, if only for a day, to seek out what unites them.

As commemorations began last week, hundreds of high school students met in a "dialogue tent" set up in the Tel Aviv square where Rabin was slain.

The images of ponytailed secular teens exchanging words with their religious counterparts provide some signs of encouragement that the gaps separating Israelis might one day diminish.

"We still may not agree, but perhaps we understand that the dismantling of settlements may be incredibly painful for one side, while making another side happy," one participant told Israel Radio.

Four years later

"When you meet face to face, you realize all the stigmas are wrong," Aviad, a 17-year-old student from a religious school in Haifa, told the Israeli daily Ma'ariv.

Israel's national day of mourning for Rabin, following the Hebrew calendar date of the assassination, began last Wednesday with a candlelighting ceremony at the presidential residence.

Other events included a state memorial ceremony at his grave at Mt. Herzl in Jerusalem and a special Knesset session.

The anniversary was marked as settler leaders began dismantling several settlements in the West Bank, sometimes facing opposition from younger, more militant settlers.

Four years ago, in the weeks preceding the slaying, settlers launched large-scale protests across Israel against turning over any West Bank territory to the Palestinians.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Abella Named Chair

TORONTO — Justice Rosalie Abella of the Ontario Court of Appeal has been named the first James R. Bullock Visiting Chair in Canadian Studies at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Abella will deliver public lectures at the university's Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies and the law school, as well as meet with members of the academic and legal communities.

Skinheads Sentenced

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, has commended a judge for imposing harsher sentences than those recommended by the Crown in the sentencing of six neo-Nazi skinheads last week. The accused received jail terms ranging from 15 months to three months for beating up several non-racist skinheads. The sentences were up to five times longer than those suggested by the Crown.

Councillor Loses Bid

VANCOUVER — Vancouver's only Jewish city councillor has been ousted from his party's slate in the Nov. 20 municipal elections. Alan Herbert lost his bid for renomination when he failed to win the support of the Non-Partisan Association (NPA).

Israel Caravan '99

TORONTO — The Canadian Zionist Federation, in co-operation with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, is announcing Israel Caravan '99, a travelling musical and education program from Israel. It will go to Kitchener-Waterloo, St. Catharines, Kingston, London, Windsor and Toronto from Oct. 30 to Nov. 3. Admission is free. The Toronto event will take place Oct. 31 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre from 7:30 to 9 p.m. For details, call 633-3988.

Milt Lewis Honored

HAMILTON — Prominent local lawyer Milt Lewis has been named to the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction. The presentation of an award will take place at a Nov. 10 dinner at the Hamilton Convention Centre. Lewis is a former strategist and organizer for the Liberal party, and a one-time president of Beth Jacob Synagogue.

ISRAEL

Immigrant Was Spy

JERUSALEM — An immigrant from the former Soviet Union was convicted last week of spying for the KGB. Valery Kaminsky pleaded guilty to providing the KGB with classified information he culled from his son, an Israeli soldier, and in his work as an airplane maintenance technician at an air force base between 1976 and 1993.

TV Host Tortured

JERUSALEM — A Palestinian talk show host spoke out on Israeli television last week after Palestinian security forces held him for 20 days because a guest on his program denounced Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. Maher Dasuki said he was blindfolded, tortured and called a collaborator during his prison stint.

WORLD

Widow Wants Papers

NEW YORK — Oskar Schindler's widow is claiming the contents of her late husband's suitcase, which a German newspaper began publishing last week. Emilie Schindler, who was estranged from her husband after 1958, told the German newsweekly Stern that she would fly to Germany from her home in Buenos Aires in the next few days to claim the papers. The Stuttgart Zeitung, which is publishing the papers, said it plans to donate the papers to Yad Vashem.

Joint Team Set Up

ROME — The Vatican and Jewish leaders have agreed to set up a team of Jewish and Catholic scholars to review published Vatican archival material relating to World War II. The move, announced last week, stops short of complying with long-standing Jewish demands that the Vatican open its wartime archives to outside researchers in order, among other things, to clarify the actions of wartime Pope Pius XII.

Article 'Anti-Semitic'

TOKYO — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is calling on advertisers in Japan's second largest weekly magazine to pressure the publication to retract an anti-Semitic article. The Oct. 15 article in the Shukan Post stated that "Wall Street Jews" were behind an American company's Sept. 28 takeover of a Japanese credit bank, adding that the "Jewish financial clique" will "eat up" Japanese taxpayer money.

Auschwitz Anniversary

LONDON — Britain is planning to make the anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz an annual Holocaust remembrance day. The first such commemoration is expected to occur Jan. 27, 2001.

Shul Vandalized

PARIS — Vandals set fire to a synagogue in a Paris suburb after damaging the shul's Torah scrolls. The incident took place in a suburb that has a large population of North African Jews.

Lauder Foundation Launches Three New Schools

VIENNA — Three new Jewish education facilities operated by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation have been inaugurated in central Europe, marking further milestones on the road to a Jewish revival in the region.

Senior politicians joined schoolchildren, parents and teachers, Jewish community members and representatives of world Jewry at the ceremonies Oct. 10 to 12 in Berlin, Vienna and Warsaw.

Lauder himself, who established his foundation 12 years ago, attended events in all three cities. The foundation started with one school in Vienna with only about 100 pupils, and has grown to serve 7,800 schoolchildren in 15 countries.

"This is the realization of a dream that I had over a decade ago," Lauder said at the Oct. 12 ceremony in Warsaw that dedicated a new, expanded campus for the Lauder-Morasha school.

The ceremonies kicked off Oct. 10 with the opening of a new teacher-training and resource centre in eastern Berlin. On Oct. 11, a dedication took place for a state-of-the-art campus for the Lauder-Chabad school in Vienna, which will serve some 400 students, many of them recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

CJC urges action on school health services funding

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Education Minister Janet Ecker promised to "move forward" on the Ontario government's commitment to extend health services to children who are not in public or separate schools.

The issue is being considered by three government ministries, Ecker said, but she did not give a firm date for its implementation, aside from the comment that she doubted there would be any action before August of next year.

Ecker was speaking to the executive of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, and her promise came only after pressure was exerted by Keith Landy, Ontario region president.

"We want action and we expect results," Landy said in introducing her.

"The premier unlocked the door and you left it open," said Moshe Ronen, national CJC president.

"As I understand it, you have gone further than any Ontario government up to now."

Ontario Education Minister Janet Ecker with CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy.

Though she responded favorably to Landy, she had bad news for about 50 members of the Jewish Day School Committee who crowded into the room.

Committee members asked that the Ontario government end its discrimination in failing to fund Jewish and other independent schools while giving financial aid to Catholic separate schools.

Ecker said she supported the government's decision to give financial help to the Catholic schools and gave no indication that any assistance would be forthcoming to others. "I worry about the fractionation of the school system."

On the other hand, the minister said her department would give close attention to a brief from Congress asking that a total of $6.5 million be allotted for health services for exceptional children: $3.7 million for 11,000 students in the Jewish Day School system, $1.5 million for 71 students in She'arim and $1.35 million for 50 students at Zareinu.

But she said it was "a complicated issue," pointing out that a total of 91,000 children attending independent schools, including the Jewish ones, are involved.

The minister faced a large sign at the back of the hall reading: "Fair Funding For All," and several signs held by students. One read: "Catholics, 100 percent, and Christians, Jews, Muslims and Sikhs, none. Is it right?"

Another read: "Stop religious discrimination by Ontario government." Standing under the sign, Georjanne Burke and Aviva Weiss of Ontario Parents for Equity in Education Funding (OPEEF) asked for a reversal of government policy.

"Some students are more equal than others," protested Wayne Levin, founder of OPEEF.

Osama Ghanim, principal of the Isna Islamic School, and M.D. Khalid of the Islamic Society of North America, were present.

Noting that the Ontario government is the only one in Canada that provides no funding for Jewish education, Igor Ellyn asked if that would be corrected by Aug. 14 of next year when international Jewish jurists meet here.

"I don't know if our action on health services will be ready by then, but I respect where you are coming from," Ecker replied.

Making a plea for students attending Zareinu, Gail Cadsky, whose grandson is at the school, said it costs $25,000 a child, and only two of the school's parents can afford the fee.

"Are you going to let us down?" she asked.

"Nobody wants these children to drown," the minister said. "Health services are only a step. I can't say where we go from here. I can't say yes or no."

The fallen classic

The deciduous trees are mostly bare now. Their leaves, like the aspirations of baseball teams at spring training, have fallen to earth.

As these words are being written, the Yankees and the Braves are competing in the World Series, or what baseball sentimentalists and Madison Avenue marketers call the "Fall Classic."

Over the years, through the tender-hearted yarns spun playfully by writers such as Roger Angell and Roger Kahn and W.P. Kinsella, the game of baseball has become enveloped in a gauze-like curtain of nostalgia and whimsy.

It is however, considerably more difficult these days to wax lyric about the professional game of baseball. After the strike of '94, many fans have grown distant from the teams, the owners and the players. Teams are increasingly seen by their fans as nothing more than temporary stops along the investment curves of owners and players; owners as hypocrites; players as mercenaries.

Indeed, for some, it may be more appropriate to refer to the World Series as the fallen classic.

Canadian baseball fans are experiencing our own particular angst right now.

Supporters of the Blue Jays worry that favorite sons Carlos Delgado and Shawn Green will refuse to accept the multi-year, mega-million dollar contract that the team will offer and as a result be traded far away into the hated colors of another team and into the rueful territory of "what-might-have-been" and "if-only."

Supporters of the Expos worry whether there will be a team at all next year in Montreal.

But, though the professional game of baseball may have alienated somewhat the affections of many fans, the game itself, that is, pure baseball uncluttered by the inverted values of the entertainment world, still deserves respect.

In that sense I agree with the Angells, the Kahns, and the Kinsellas who have written and continue to write fondly about the game, who, in one form or another have all contended that the game can be viewed as a metaphor for life.

In some ways, it is not too far a stretch to say that baseball replicates life. There are indeed many "lessons" about baseball that apply in equal measure to life.

A layman's cursory reflection yields at least six such lessons:

• Baseball is not played against the clock. The clock may become a factor in the game, but the outcome of the game never depends on the clock. Baseball allows the player to extract the full experience of the game without regard to the ticking down of minutes or the dying of seconds. Just as in life, individuals who work or "play" against the clock, deprive themselves of the essence of the activity in which they are involved.

• The focus is on the individual to "make the play," to drive in the run, even though forces are arrayed in opposition and a number of key circumstances are not in his or her total control.

• But team effort is also vital. An individual neither plays nor lives in isolation. What one does "on the field" always affects one's "teammates" too, and what others on the team do, affect the individual player.

• Baseball can be played by everyone regardless of size, gender, race, ancestry, place of origin, color, citizenship or creed.

• There is always tomorrow – except of course, at the very end of the season. One must wisely learn the lessons of defeat and humbly accept the rewards of victory. There is room neither for despair nor for complacency. Just as in life, baseball usually offers a second chance.

• One should never give up. For as we have been told about baseball countless times, "the game's not over till it's over."

To properly bid goodbye to the baseball season, I reproduce a poem by Canada's award-winning poet and baseball poet laureate, Shel Krakofsky. Very few writers capture as sweetly and as poignantly as Shel Krakofsky the really true messages common to both baseball and life.

How to Call a Home Run my wife cups hands over Friday candles when I discover how to call a home run without the repetitive and tiresome going...going...gone!

there is no resonance in the masquerading mediocrities like the wooden call of it's high…it's deep…good bye!

dramatic and magisterial the home run is more nuanced a ball that travels to the other side of physical

the only sport that rewards a journey beyond the bounds past familiar horizon triumph arrives with a ball at rest

as Dalia spreads whispered benedictions across the field
a larger blazing ball descends to Sabbath repose

I make the perfect call
Sunset, I sigh, a home run is Sunset

Toronto ORT launches mentoring program

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The first ever, after school, non-denominational, multicultural mentoring program in the Toronto area will be launched on Oct. 28, by Toronto ORT.

George Berger, president of Toronto ORT, said that with an increasing demand for people to be computer literate, job candidates need the skills that will be taught in the program to win even the most rudimentary entry-level jobs.

The establishment of the project was announced at Toronto region's ORT Canada's 25th Golden Circle Luncheon honoring communal volunteer Libby Dwor of Port Colborne, Ont., and Toronto.

The luncheon was held recently at the home of Hinda and Allan Silber.

Toronto ORT formed a partnership with The Bank of Montreal and IBM Canada, and will be working with six local Jewish social service agencies on the new project directed at children from families living below the poverty line.

Twenty-four students in grades 6 to 9 will take part in the pilot project. The three components which make this a unique program include a computer for home use; student-mentor matching; and one evening a week, a study skills and computer technology lesson.

In accepting her citation, honoree Dwor said, "Life has been good to me. I was fortunate to have had such a wonderful devoted husband for 43 years, four fabulous children and their equally fine mates, nine grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren – many who are here today. I take none of this for granted."

Dwor has devoted her life to volunteerism and philanthropy in the fields of health and education, locally, nationally and internationally. She is a recipient of the Ontario Citizen Volunteer Award.

Dwor and her late husband, Richard, developed two projects in Israel – a sports complex in Tzur Nathan and a cultural centre in Kfar Menachem.

Dwor, who moved to Port Colborne in 1936 as a bride, spoke of her memories and the numerous Jewish and community projects she has been involved in over the years. Dwor has served as president of the Port Colborne General Hospital Auxiliary, as a member of the executive board of the United Israel Appeal of Canada Women's Division, and as a board member of the Community Concert Association.

In presenting the award to Dwor, Ruth Druxerman, who co-chaired the luncheon with Helen Marr, praised Dwor for her involvement in ORT and "for enriching many lives, strangers whose names you do not know but whom you have given the gift of education that works."

More than $85,000 was raised at the sold-out Golden Circle Luncheon.

The money will support the ORT Young Women to the 21st Century project which will provide scholarships for young women pursuing careers in math, science and technology at ORT high schools in Israel.

Kathleen Crook, president of ORT Canada told of the need for a skilled and educated workforce in Israel. "Young women are being targeted to meet this demand."

Luncheon speaker, Heather Reisman, 51, founder, president and CEO of the Indigo Books, Music and Cafe chain, presented her perspective of women, in the past and where they are today.

Describing herself as "an optimistic spirit," she outlined developments for women through the '60s and '70s when women struggled for equality in the workplace and at the same time, tried to retain a complete commitment to the family. With women making difficult trade-offs, she suggested that in this generation, more discussion should be encouraged.

Others participating in the program included, Jehudi Kinar, consul general of Israel; Elinor Caplan, minister of immigration and citizenship; and Dwor's son, Mark.

Markham Lubavitch planning to honor Latinsky's memory

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Sheryl Latinsky

TORONTO — The Chabad Lubavitch of Markham Sisterhood's annual Women Make a Difference event this year will honor the memory of Sheryl Latinsky.

The event will be held Nov. 2, at 8 p.m., at the synagogue, 83 Green Lane in Thornhill.

The guest speaker will be New York lecturer Miriam Swerdlow, who will speak on Men are from Mars, Women are from Venus, How Do We Get Along?

There will also be a fashion show by Chadwick's of Bayview Village. Decadent desserts and door prizes will round out the evening.

Previous honorees include volunteers from Zareinu and Bikur Cholim, and children of survivors.

Latinsky, 43, was killed in an automobile accident in September. She was a founding member of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham who remained very active and involved. She also volunteered for Reena and for the Starlight Theatre.

A widow, Latinsky is survived by her two children, Leonard, 18, and Raymond, 15, her father, Morrie Hackner, and four sisters.

A dedication booklet is being prepared in her memory. For information about the booklet or the event, call the shul, 905-886-0420.

Torah Ethics Program launched by Orthodox Caucus

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 400 people jammed the sanctuary of Beth Jacob Congregation in North York for the recent launch of the Torah Ethics Program of the Orthodox Caucus.

Speaker Rabbi Jacob Schacter, spiritual leader of the Jewish Centre in New York, and incoming dean of the newly established Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik Institute in Boston, slammed people who believe that rebuking or humiliating others is acceptable as long as one's intentions are good.

"If someone hurts another, it is like putting a hand in fire," he said. "God doesn't want to hear your excuses or justification."

One of the best-known biblical stories dealing with this issue is that of Channah, the mother of the prophet Samuel, who for many years was unable to have a child with her husband Elkanah. Elkanah's other wife, Pnina, who was blessed with many children, teased and taunted Channah unmercifully.

Pnina, Rabbi Schacter explained, was a very good person, who acted as she did l'shaim shomayim, for the sake of heaven. "She wanted to help her. She knew that if Channah really davened [out of desperation and pain], God would respond to her prayers."

While that is in fact what happened, and Channah went on to have several children, Pnina suffered a terrible punishment. For each child Channah bore, one of Pnina's died.

The bottom line is that the holiest of purposes doesn't mean anything if one doesn't have kevod haberiyot, sensitivity and understanding.

The Talmud is replete with such examples, the rabbi said. He cited the examples of Korach, who questioned the authority of Moses and Aaron, and Bilaam, the evil prophet who was told by God through his (Bilaam's) donkey not to curse the Jewish people. When Aaron's wooden staff magically flowered and Korach's stayed bare, the people were shown the staffs not by Aaron, but by his son.

"You have to think of the dignity not only of a great scholar, but of a low-life like Korach," Rabbi Schacter said.

Similarly, immediately after the donkey prophesied to Bilaam, it died. Rabbi Schacter, describing Bilaam wryly as "not a nice guy," said God killed the donkey "so that the world wouldn't say that this is the animal that bested Bilaam in an argument."

Perhaps the most dramatic example was the story of Kamtza and Bar Kamtza. Bar Kamtza was invited in error to a feast given by his sworn enemy...The enemy insisted Bar Kamtza leave, even though he offered to pay for his meal, or for the whole feast, to avoid being humiliated.

Bar Kamtza, in a rage, went to the Roman emperor, and told him how to destroy Jerusalem. "God took the side of Bar Kamtza and destroyed the bais hamikdash, because of Bar Kamtza's bousha (humiliation)," Rabbi Schacter said. "That's how awful that kind of behavior is considered."

In the weeks before Rabbi Schacter's speech, the Torah Ethics Program Committee sent study guides and discussion ideas on kevod haberiyot to schools, shuls, organizations and individuals in the city. The rabbi said he deliberately chose to focus on different aspects of the topic in his presentation.

The Orthodox community in North America has made great strides in improving its relationship with God, Rabbi Schacter said. What it must focus on now, he said, is improving "sensitivity to one another, those with whom we interact, and especially with those we don't."

Thanks A Million

Last week was one in a million for UJA Federation thanks to a series of successful Super Sunday and Super Week telethons.

It all began when over 350 volunteer campaigners contacted 2,500 donors in one day raising more than $700,000. By the end of the week, an additional 1,000 contributors brought the week's telethon tally up to over $1 million, pushing the annual campaign well over the $24 million mark. That figure includes $1.5 million of increased contributions over last year.

Many community members showed their enthusiasm by saying "Hi UJA...I'm answering the call" and increasing their gifts from last year. Their names were entered into a draw for two round trip tickets to Israel.

"Volunteers were dialing up donors from 9:00 a.m. to 9:00 p.m. in a remarkable demonstration of community spirit," says Judy Engel, who is co-chairing UJA Federation's Answer the Call telethons with Rosanne Ain and Dov Altman. The next set of telethons will be held November 7-10.

Super Sunday drew community members of all ages, including some as young as five, who helped out with everything from sorting pledge cards to passing out snacks.

"It's great to see so many kids and students and young adults pitching in," adds Ain. More than 100 Young Leadership volunteers took over the last shift of the day keeping the momentum going until the very end.

"The phenomenal turnout of young adults shows there's a tremendous interest in raising funds for the community," notes Corey Gurevitz, Chair of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Fundraising Steering Committee. "I was very impressed with the energy in the room," adds Michael Long.

"Thanks to a great telethon committee, our volunteers, many of whom were first timers, felt very appreciated," adds David Engel, who is co-chairing UJA Federation's Campaign 2000 with Mel Wolfond. "We couldn't have done it without them."

Barrett Deposits Banking Advice

Matthew Barrett is now living and working in the U.K., but the former head of the Bank of Montreal is still offering the Canadian government blunt advice about the country's banking industry.

"I care passionately about the future of Canadian banking," Barrett, Chief Executive Officer of Barclay's PLC in London, told an audience of leading UJA Federation contributors, during a recent visit to Toronto. The event, at the Royal Ontario Museum, was co-chaired by Greg Wolfond, Paul Godfrey and Neil Nisker.

Barrett, who accepted the prestigious position at Barclay's after 37 years at the Bank of Montreal, expressed concern about Canadian banking in what he expects to be his last speech in Canada for some time.

"I am concerned for the future of Canadian banking because I have seen such a substantial amount of investment in its past and because I bear some responsibility for putting it on our national agenda," explained Barrett.

In response to the Canadian government's veto of his proposal to merge the Bank of Montreal with Royal Bank earlier this year, Barrett cautioned Ottawa not to ignore the winds of change sweeping through the global economy. Demographic shifts, advanced technology and deregulation, says Barrett are dramatically altering the financial sector, making it more challenging for Canadian banking institutions to remain competitive.

"Everywhere, governments understand that creating financial companies able to compete internationally is the only way to preserve a national industry. Except apparently in Canada," said Barrett. "I can only hope and trust that the legislation the government is now preparing will deal with issues of industry ownership and regulation that are growing more urgent day by day."

"Last year, many people in effect said that financial services are so important they can never be allowed to change. I would reply that they are so important that they must change."

Barrett added that decisions pertaining to banking are "best made by management and shareholders."

Advice, best left unsaid

Nelson Mandela, the former president of South Africa is one of the most recognized figures in the world, an icon for the downtrodden, an inspiration for the oppressed, living proof that strength of will can subdue the will of strength and that the human spirit may indeed be destroyed but never defeated.

But, being only human, Mandela's information is not always accurate; nor is his judgment always sound; nor is his advice always correct. This was evident last week as he spoke to leaders in Israel and in Gaza.

Mandela was on his first ever visit to the Middle East. Prior to Israel and Gaza, he had stopped in Syria, Iran and Jordan. And of course he felt compelled to counsel the government of Israel on a range of difficult issues.

On the prospects for peace: "There will be no peace until Israel withdraws from all the territories which it won from Arabs in 1967," Mandela proclaimed, echoing the maximalist views of the Arab world. "No one has dared to attack you since the 1967 war," he incorrectly told Israel's foreign minister David Levy.

On the 13 Iranian Jews locked away in prison: Mandela offered that their arrest stemmed from Iranian fears of an "American-Israeli conspiracy." When reminded by Levy that the charges were baseless and without any foundation in truth, Mandela flippantly responded: "Maybe they need a good lawyer."

On the process of making peace. "If the only alternative is violence, we will use violence," he told the Palestinian legislative assembly in Gaza. Of all the remarks, this was the most egregious.

It was uninformed. Yasser Arafat has already, at the White House, with the president of the United States as his witness, publicly disavowed resort to violence as a way of resolving the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

And it was retrograde. It sets the clock back to pre-Oslo days. It confers legitimacy on the bloody tactics and the destructive strategy of the peace rejectionists, who have always maintained that the only alternative is violence.

It would have better advanced the prospects for peace in the region if the advice by the former president of South Africa had been left unsaid.

Fourth yahrzeit

Last week, on the 11th of Cheshvan, Israelis and Jews throughout the world remembered the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. On that fourth yahrzeit, Israeli society appears to have coalesced around the centre, determined, or perhaps more accurately, resigned to the fact that some form of territorial compromise is the best long-lasting solution to the question of coexistence with the Palestinians. And despite seemingly intractable internal divisions, many Israelis are determined to coalesce around the centre in this regard as well, to bridge the gaps somehow and to seal the societal fissures.

We in the Diaspora must assist Israelis – and ourselves as well – to achieve that result in whatever manner we can.

CAPTIVE IN IRAN

The government of Iran still holds the following members of the Jewish community as prisoners. Each is a universe of life and existence unto his own. And each has a name. Let us not forget them.

Javeed Beit Yakov, Navid Bala Zadeh, Nejat Broukhim, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Faramarz Kashi, Farzad Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Dani Teffilin, Omid Teffilin, Ashessr Zadmehr.

Readers give reasons for objecting to column

The commentary by Ron Csillag in the Oct. 14 issue of The CJN on the general media's coverage of the tragic death of Moshe Nussbaum evoked a strong reaction among some readers, who took offence both with how it was written and that it was written.

The opinion expressed by the writer was a personal one. But it was certainly not his intention to offend anyone. Nor, of course, was that the intention of The CJN.

We apologize to any of our readers whom we offended.

The editor.

There are two issues that your columnist Ron Csillag does not seem to understand. The hype surrounding the unfortunate death of Moshe Nussbaum was in many ways no different than the unfortunate death several months ago of an Eastern Orthodox priest killed by a car fleeing from a police pursuit or the current investigation of the murder of a young Sri Lankan girl. This is the nature of the media.

The second issue is the trivialization of Nussbaum and of the Orthodox community. A man who was instrumental in founding three major Toronto schools and one large shul "was not a prominent member of the Toronto Jewish community?" And who, pray tell, is a prominent member of the Toronto Jewish community according to Csillag?

The cavalier dismissal of a very dynamic and significant part of the Jewish community as "a very small, closed, low-profile and inaccessible part of the city's Jewish population: the ultra-Orthodox, far-right Agudah movement," is more a reflection of a bias of some members of the broader Jewish community, and specifically of Csillag, than an accurate reflection of any fact.

Yes, I am a member of the "very small, closed, low profile, inaccessible, ultra-Orthodox, far-right, Agudah movement" and very proud of it.

How dare you besmirch the memory of a person whom you did not know personally, so tragically plucked from our midst, whose aristocratic stature and noble character included everything a human being has to represent, created in the image of God. How many of your "Huge range of affiliations – representatives," can be compared to this exemplary leader of our community. May he rest in peace.

I found the recent article "Moshe Nussbaum: Media Star" by Ron Csillag profoundly disturbing.

The utter lack of sympathy and respect for a person who dedicated his life to Jewish continuity and Jewish tradition and died under tragic circumstances was truly revolting. Nussbaum was very far from being, as Csillag described him, the pillar of a very small, closed, low-profile and inaccessible part of the ultra-Orthodox, far-right Agudah movement.

Rather, he was part of a constructive force in modern Judaism that is reaching out selflessly to Jews of all levels of observance in order to prevent the spiritual holocaust that is currently reflected in intermarriage rates of over 50 percent in the U.S. Reform community and the establishment of messianic christianity as the fourth largest "movement" among Jews.

If there is substantive evidence that any other Jewish force besides normative Torah observance has been able to ensure Jewish continuity through several generations, I would like Csillag to provide this information credibly instead of denigrating individuals who have distinguished themselves through a lifelong dedication to progressive and successful Jewish causes.

I am not a member of Agudah Israel, nor did I ever have the honor of meeting Moshe Nussbaum, of blessed memory. Yet I found the article by Ron Csillag ("Moshe Nussbaum Media Star") deeply offensive.

I actually agree with Csillag that the media dwells too much on unnewsworthy events in the lives of the rich and famous, but those are the facts of life. If the national media recognized the importance of quiet, retiring Nussbaum to the Jewish community, and hence to Canada, it should be lauded for its refreshing exercise of good judgment, not excoriated for daring to describe an "ultra-Orthodox" Jew as a "prominent member of the Toronto Jewish community."

I was dismayed to read Ron Csillag's article in which he questions the "newsworthiness" of the tragic death of Moshe Nussbaum. How mean-spirited and petty to begrudge Nussbaum's contributions to the Jewish community. Just because he dedicated his energies to one segment of the Jewish community does not diminish the respect he deserves for his vision, commitment and self-sacrifice. True, there is no overall "leader" in the Toronto Jewish community, but one would be hard-pressed to find a more accomplished "pillar" in any of our many community segments.

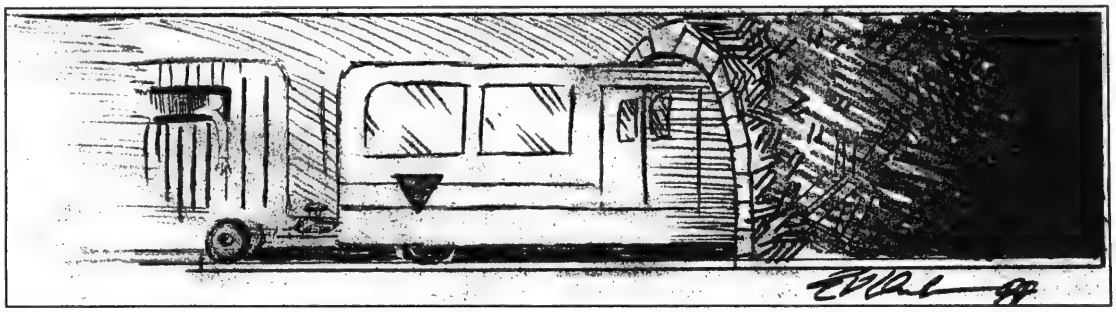
'The truth will come out'

By APRIL SHOUR LAUFER

Justice, justice shalt thou pursue, that thou mayest live... (Deuteronomy 16:20)

He got up out of bed slowly and carefully so as not to disturb his wife. He slid his feet into his slippers. As quietly as he could, he closed the door to their bedroom. It was 5 a.m.

He went to the kitchen table and picked up the newspaper. Just as he had for the past two months, he sat down and looked over the familiar articles. He leaned his head against the palm of his left hand. He was tired, but inside of him there was a kind of nervousness that made it impossible for him to rest. As he turned the pages of the newspaper, he tried to make sure he did not make a sound. He didn't want his wife to know that he had had yet another restless night. She had awakened on many a morning to find him at the kitchen table with his scalding tea in one hand, glasses on the bridge of his nose, as he peered at the words of the newspaper.



The words that he read disturbed him. How many times had he read such stories? A man accused of involvement in the death of 500 Jewish inmates, 1,000, 10,000. The numbers didn't matter.

And now 50 years later. Legal technicalities. Semantics. "Alleged" war criminals. Witnesses deceased or too ill to testify. The prosecution of those accused of war crimes had not been successful. And if, perhaps, found guilty now? "Possible" deportation.

Was this justice? Was this all? It was like going back 50 years. People didn't want to hear the stories then, and now it was time to forget and let old men die in peace. But for some, there would never be peace.

As he read the paper, he listened with half an ear, waiting for the sound of the morning paper being slapped against the veranda door. He was anxious to see what else had been written. Somehow the reporters' words describing the trial weren't quite right. Where was the outrage? Where was the sorrow? Where was the shock? He examined the words carefully, as if he was seeking some truth.

The newspapers were filled with the most awful stories. Wars seemed to ravage the planet. Had the horrors of war somehow been diminished?

Not for him. He remembered every day of his five years in Auschwitz. He remembered the sights, the smells. He was awakened nightly by the memories, the tears. The cries were his own.

But where were the lessons that were supposed to be learned? Where was the justice sought?

An hour later, his wife entered the kitchen. She looked over at him. He didn't raise his eyes from the newspaper. She wanted to tell him not to go to the court that day, just as she had wanted to tell him every day for the past two months. She didn't. After almost 50 years of marriage, could she insist he not go?

Though he could see perfectly well with his glasses, he sat with the newspaper up close to his face. Looking at him she had the sense he was searching for something. She was afraid for him, but she understood that there was some force pushing him.

They had both suffered so much. Lost so much. They had found each other after the war, and they had left Europe, come to Canada and built a new life and a new family. But the pain of those years, of the loss of their parents, brothers, sisters, weighed like stones in their hearts. The ache was forever. The memories never vanished.

When he returned from the trial at the end of the day looking older and frailer, he would turn to his wife and say, "The truth will come out."

She started the kettle again. He put his glasses down on the table and got up. He shuffled by her as she stood at the sink, and she wanted to offer him some words of comfort, but she didn't know them.

"I'm going to shower."

And she, not turning from the sink, sighed quietly. What could she say?

Why now? Why had he suddenly decided to go to this trial? He wasn't going to the court in order to testify. He was going there just to be there. To look at the man accused of collaborating with the Nazis. She knew of his sleeplessness. Torturing himself because he insisted on attending the trial. Fifty years. Who was left to say what had happened? Who believed the memories of old men?

She heard him finish the shower. A few minutes later he came into the dining room with his prayer book in his hand and tfillin wrapped around his arm. He wasn't a religious man, but ever since he started attending the trial, he had put on his tfillin and said the morning prayers. She thought that maybe it gave him the strength he needed to make the trip downtown to the courthouse; to sit, to listen to the testimony.

He was dressed in his best suit. She offered him a sandwich for the day. She had wrapped it carefully so that he could put it in his pocket unobtrusively. He left, saying, "I'll be home for supper." He said it as if it was just a workday. And he walked out the door.

He took the bus and then the subway to the courthouse. He didn't enjoy the subway ride. It was too noisy. The clanking and occasional screeching of the wheels jarred his nerves. Sometimes the train would stop between stations and there might even be a momentary darkness. He would find himself start to perspire and his breathing would quicken.

The first time the subway had stopped unexpectedly, he had had a moment of sheer panic. Sitting there in the darkened tunnel, he suddenly felt as if he wouldn't be able to escape; he could hardly catch his breath. He had been afraid that he was having a heart attack. Then, when the train finally started up again he concentrated on trying to breathe slowly, and soon, with much relief, he found he was breathing normally.

TAKE ADVANTAGE

Every day. Every day the memories were there to seize him. And hold him. And every day he fought to remember all the things that he had to be grateful for. He couldn't help it that now, when he should simply be enjoying his grandchildren and spending time with his wife, he had to be in court. He had to. "The truth will come out," he repeated to himself. It was 50 years, but it was not over.

He was 76 years old. As he sat in the courtroom, listening to the testimony of other old men, he wondered what he was doing there. What was he expecting? A gesture, a word, a cry of despair, a sigh of remorse? Something that might take away the nightmares, that might ease his pain.

The man accused said he was innocent. But what else? What would he say? Who had ever admitted to his crimes? And who was left to say the truth? Whose memories did the prosecution seek? "Old men, tired, weary, old men," said the defence counsel.

He sat in the courtroom staring at the back of the head of the accused. There was a difference of only two years between them. The accused wore a suit that was almost the same color as his own. He imagined that the accused looked a little more portly than himself. He sighed as he recalled missing some of his indulgences. His diabetes and years of stomach trouble had caused him to lose 25 pounds.

They were both old men. But one had been the victim.

He went home at noon that day. There were no more witnesses to be called. Two were in hospital and one couldn't make the trip to the courtroom due to illness. No more witnesses.

He took the subway home thinking of the last two months in the courthouse. He was sad, and he felt a headache coming on. He had not had any real expectations. He just had to see for himself, to be there.

And what was it that he had been seeking? Justice?

When he arrived home he found that his wife had left him a note that she had gone out with her sister-in-law, she would be home by 3 p.m. He took a washcloth and ran it under cold water, hoping it would soothe his headache. He lay down in his bed and let the wet of the washcloth mix with his tears.

He thought of his mother, brother, and sisters, who had been killed. He thought of the hundreds of his extended family whose life had ended in Auschwitz, Treblinka, Bergen-Belsen, Sobibor, Mauthausen.

He heard his wife come through the front door. He knew she was carrying parcels, but he didn't have the strength to get up. Later, he thought.

But then suddenly that thought jolted him. That was the thing. The memories, the nightmares, the sorrow would never end. No one to take responsibility. No justice. It was too late. Later would not come.

Opinions

Confidence of the wrong sort

One does not have to be a psychologist to know that self-confidence is important for achieving one's goals, but confidence in things and people unknown to us is most of the time a dubious value.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Hence, it is well to stay as far away as possible from the old "confidence game."

It robs innocent (and often elderly) people of their savings, because they believe a stranger with a tall tale to tell and the gift of gab, who appeals to the victims' greed and need and often leaves them bereft of their life savings.

The AARP Bulletin, a publication of the American Association of Retired Persons, devoted a recent issue to the latest aspect of come-ons that are thought to appeal to older people.

From time to time, my wife and I have been the recipients of a personalized piece of mail that addresses us by our first or last names and, at first sight, looks quite legitimate. We are advised that we have been chosen, along with a very few others to be the recipients of a large prize.

One letter advised us of no less than $11 million that was said to be ours for the asking. All we had to do was respond right away and our chances of winning millions were excellent.

We did not necessarily have to subscribe to anything or spend any money, but the context of the message was quite clear: if we did, our chances would be very much better.

Fortunately, we have never fallen prey to this kind of "invitation" and always commit the bulky mailing to the recycling bin. But others have not been so cautious.

I have recently been made aware of a family that lost a lot of money because they were seduced by the personalized nature of the mailing and grabbed the opportunity of getting something for nothing. As so often in cases of that kind, the "nothing" cost them a lot of cash.

The AARP Bulletin article, which was headlined "Sweepstakes on Trial," made me wonder why so many people are enticed by such promises of easy gain.

Their experience should have taught them long ago that luck rarely plays a role in making life richer or better.

Usually, hard work is the key that unlocks the door to satisfaction. But apparently they swallow the bait because they are unaware that a computer can make the letter look "personal" for millions of people.

I do not know whether Jewish people are particularly prone to fall for these manipulations. Our teaching is rather down-to-earth and not stuffed with high-flown fancy. If the past High Holy Days should have taught us anything, it was certainly that cause and effect have a prime role in determining who we are and how we are doing.

The current "sweepstakes" that are sweeping North America and stuffing our mailboxes play a different tune: effect without a cause. But life has not been and never will be one big casino.

Rabin's legacy

Four years after Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, Israelis are debating his legacy and the lasting impact of that tragic night in Tel Aviv. With the perspective of four years and two changes of government, the picture seems different than it did in the immediate aftermath of November 4, 1995.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

At the time, Israeli society appeared to be more divided than ever and torn asunder by the violent act. The existing divide between left and right on the peace issue was deepened by the shock over the identity of the assassin, who hailed from the mainstream Zionist religious camp.

As a result, the left-secular community blamed the right-religious community for the hate campaign against Rabin and peace. In turn, the religious-right community hunkered down into a defensive position and refused, for the most part, to engage in a serious, introspective analysis of its role in the events leading to the murder.

As Benjamin Netanyahu defeated Shimon Peres in 1996 and formed a coalition of the religious and right wing parties opposed to Oslo, it appeared that Rabin's legacy of peace with the Palestinians had been short-lived. Netanyahu's "coalition of outsiders" thrived on a sectoral debate in which there was little sense of national vision or unity, and in which "them" (the defeatist, pro-peace camp) versus "us" (the strong, nationalist camp) became the national idiom.

But beneath the surface, different currents could be discerned. The Israeli centre had accepted Rabin's view of the need for peace even with an enemy whom it did not trust, and its vote for Netanyahu was an attempt to identify a leader who could deliver on that approach. Once disenchanted, these voters deserted him as quickly as they had embraced him. Their approach to the issue of peace remained consistent, but their confidence in their leader had been shattered. They rejected Netanyahu's lip service to "peace with security," and turned to a leader who reflected Rabin's commitment in a more authentic manner.

Four years after the assassination, the consensus on peace is firmly in the centre of the political map. The right has been weakened and marginalized for several reasons. First was the sobering effect of Rabin's death. Even today, those within the settler movement who oppose Barak's initiatives know that their campaign has to be milder and less vitriolic. Israelis have little tolerance left for the violent rhetoric that preceded the assassination.

Second is the legacy of Netanyahu's short term in office. By redeploying in Hebron and by signing the Wye agreement, both firmly within the parameters of Oslo, Netanyahu moved the entire political map to the centre.

Finally, the settlers understand that their historic campaign to win over Israeli public opinion has failed. The majority of Israelis are prepared to sacrifice some of the settlements for peace, and the mainstream leadership of the settlement movement is focused on protecting what it has in the face of an inexorable process.

Israeli society is far less polarized on peace than it was four years ago, and on both sides, there is a more open acknowledgement of the grey areas and complexities of the negotiations. The residual debate between left and right is over the pace of their implementation.

Ehud Barak personifies this understanding. Unlike Rabin, he has been determined to legitimize all sides in the debate, while strongly defending his position and the rules of the democratic game. His handling of the recent decision to evacuate 12 illegal outposts established on the eve of the last election is a case in point. Barak met with the settlers and negotiated with them. They, in turn, realized that the battle was lost almost before it began, and agreed to co-operate in the evacuation. Barak rejects the extremism of small pockets on the left and the right, and holds firmly to the centrist position that Rabin initiated, but could not consummate.

In a symbolic act that reflects these changes, 54 Israeli Orthodox rabbis recently proclaimed Rabin's assassin, Yigal Amir, to be "outside of the community of Israel." This public declaration stands in sharp relief to the statements by some rabbis, in the months preceding the assassination, stating that Rabin was a moser, thereby invoking ancient edicts that might legitimize his killing.

Some Israeli commentators have compared Rabin's assassination to that of Abraham Lincoln, rather than John Kennedy. The Kennedy assassination traumatized American society and deepened its fissures. In contrast, Lincoln was killed after the Civil War had been decided and the South had been defeated. In retrospect, it seems that Rabin was killed after his concept of peace had won over a majority of Israelis. The moment of trauma passed, and the ship of state has continued – if slowly and tortuously – toward the goal he set.

Reinventing Judaism

No one should underestimate the vitality and ingenuity of religious Judaism, despite the messages of doom that have been common over the past decade. I have long argued that the ever-growing fragmentation of Judaism, the increasing number of religious options and movements, is an asset to Jewish survival.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

I hold this view despite the often fractious conflict that accompanies such diversity. Let me just stress that these headline-grabbing instances of conflict are usually the provocative pronouncements of a leader of one faction of one of the religious movements. They have almost no material impact whatsoever on the daily lives of Canadian Jews.

While I cannot outline the full argument in the space of a column, I can note some examples of the creativity and adaptability that one can find right through the religious spectrum.

Just recently, the Secular Humanistic Jewish movement ordained its first rabbi in a ceremony in Michigan.

Prior to this, rabbis active in Secular Humanistic Judaism had been ordained by other movements. For some readers, the idea of rabbis serving as leaders of secular Jews might seem anomalous.

And for others who recall the strength of secular Judaism as associated with a vibrant daily Yiddish and socialist culture, the very fact that the movement exists may be puzzling. But there it is.

I have no idea about the extent of the popularity of secular Judaism in North America. I have a hunch that like Reconstructionist Judaism, many among the non-Orthodox would agree with elements of their philosophy. As the (Orthodox) political scientist Charles Liebman once noted, "Most American Jews are Reconstructionist but just don't know it."All I can wish the new Rabbi Tamara Ruth Kolton is a hearty mazal tov.

Just recently I attended a lovely bat mitzvah ceremony held at a traditional Conservative synagogue. It was held on a Sunday morning, and entailed the bat mitzvah reading selections from the Torah and the book of Ruth (no actual Torah scroll was used) and singing some religious songs in a moving ceremony. While there was no actual prayer service – which allowed there to be mixed seating – the event certainly had the feel of a service. More important, this type of ceremony certainly fills a niche for those Jews unable to embrace a more egalitarian ethos.

Modern Orthodoxy also has promoted similar sorts of events as young girls come of age, often based around the delivery of a d'var Torah, or sermon based on an analysis of religious text. But a far greater innovation has been the slow emergence within the Orthodox community of the importance, indeed value, of offering higher Torah education to girls and young women.

These options, which include yeshivot exclusively for women, are so far second tier operations. The prohibition against ordination of women means there is a reinforced glass ceiling which sets a limit to the level of Torah scholarship available to young women, and to how far they can rise in the hierarchy of Judaic learning. The term talmid chacham does not yet have a well accepted feminine equivalent. But no one should bet on the gender status quo for the long term, even within Orthodox Judaism.

And change abounds even within haredi Judaism! In a recent article Professor Hayim Soloveitchik of Yeshiva University describes trends within various Orthodox, and haredi communities.

Hasidic rock bands are not unheard of. Upscale kosher restaurants are increasingly common. A concern for fashion and style and middle-class consumerism in general is growing.

The haredi are certainly aware of the need to harness modern technology, including computers and the Internet, to the goals of observance. While an actual visit is always preferable, soon large numbers of Jews will make virtual trips to the Western Wall from the comforts of their own homes, seeing and hearing the Kotel day or night, and faxing (already available) or e-mailing their actual prayer for placement in the Wall's cracks.

The point here is that the one constant in religious Jewish life, for every denomination or movement, is change.

New Israel Fund seeks to close gaps

When Israel declared statehood in 1948, the words "justice" and "equality" were on the lips of its founders. Israel, they fervently hoped, would be a kinder, gentler society, a light on to the nations. In the view of Eliezer Yaari, executive director of the New Israel Fund in Israel, these goals have yet to be met.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Five decades on, despite its achievements in numerous spheres, Israel is a fragmented country, torn in particular by religious and ethnic divisions. Acutely cognizant of Israel's failings, the New Israel Fund is dedicated to the proposition that these cleavages can and should be closed.

"There is a need for social pioneering," said Yaari, a 50-year-old Jerusalem-based former combat pilot and television producer who's in charge of the New Israel Fund's array of philanthropic programs in the Jewish state.

Founded in the United States 20 years ago, the New Israel Fund works to strengthen democracy and advance social justice. To that end, it funds a network of non-partisan, non-profit organizations whose broad objective is to improve the lives of Israelis from all walks of life.

More specifically, it promotes progressive values, be they civil and human rights or religious pluralism and tolerance. It is also concerned with such cutting-edge issues as the status of women, Jewish-Arab equality and coexistence, the environment and government accountability. More ambitiously, it seeks to bridge economic and social gaps.

Eliezer Yaari

Yaari, on his first visit here since being appointed to his position two years ago, said that the New Israel Fund complements the United Jewish Appeal and the United Israel Appeal. "They were very, very important in building Israel's physical infrastructure and in absorbing new immigrants," he noted.

By contrast, the role of the New Israel Fund is to nurture civic, moral and ethical values.

Propped up by a $16 million (US) budget, it channels financial assistance to some 120 organizations, with the average grant being $24,000 (US). "We also provide technical support to about 400 organizations, and run 700 workshops around the country," Yaari added.

Working through organizations like the Association for Civil Rights in Israel (ACRI) and Shatil, the New Israel Fund has scored important successes.

ACRI took up the cause of three Arab women whose Jerusalem apartment had been repeatedly vandalized. The case went to the Supreme Court, and the judges ruled that the women, having been victims of terrorism, should be compensated for their suffering.

In addition, ACRI came to the aid of a Jewish woman who had been denied access to her seat on a municipal religious council. The Supreme Court proclaimed that her exclusion was illegal.

Striving to improve the status of Israeli women, the New Israel Fund, through such partners as Isha L'Isha and Kol Ha'Isha, set up rape crisis centres, shelters for battered women and feminist centres.

In the field of Arab-Jewish equality, it backs programs such as Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam's School for Peace and the Centre for Jewish-Arab Economic Development.

Aware that deficient housing and substandard education affect Sephardi, Russian and Ethiopian Jews, the New Israel Fund has striven to eliminate these causes of disaffection. According to Yaari, campaigns were launched to enable renters to buy flats at subsidized prices and to forge a Sephardi educational leadership.

Israel is increasingly threatened by the loss of its green spaces and by toxic wastes and pollution. Through the Israel Union for Environmental Defence, the New Israel Fund alerts Israelis to the importance of preserving the environment.

Two years ago, 12 Israeli commandos were killed during a military operation in Lebanon. When aggrieved parents complained that the body parts of their sons had been mixed up, the army dismissed their claim. The New Israel Fund stepped in, and the case was eventually settled.

Although foreign donations account for the bulk of its budget, Yaari said that Israelis are contributing. "Next year, we plan to raise about $1 million (US) in Israel," he said. "We're trying to enhance the culture of giving."

In Canada, almost $1 million was raised in 1998.

Yaari said that a collaborative effort between Israel and the Diaspora is crucial to its success. "The name of the game is partnership. It's not a question of giving and forgetting."

Before joining the New Israel Fund, Yaari, born in Jerusalem, was an air force pilot and instructor. Flying Mirages and Kfirs from 1969 to 1977, he shot down two enemy aircraft in combat. A graduate of the Hebrew University and of Harvard, he was successively a TV reporter, producer, editor and anchor for the Israel Broadcast Authority. Now, with the New Israel Fund, the sky seems to be the limit.

Ashkenaz visual exhibits

At the recent Ashkenaz festival of new Yiddish culture, two visual arts exhibitions intrigued me – Jewish Sites of North Africa and the Jewish Labor Bund.

The first was a celebration of Sephardi architecture, primarily in Morocco, Tunisia and Egypt. The second, bound up with Ashkenazi Jews in Russia and Eastern Europe, charted the course of an ideological movement dedicated to socialism and secular Yiddish culture.

D. R. Cowles' black-and-white photographs of synagogues, cemeteries, saints' shrines and alley-ways in North Africa harkened back to a time when Jewish communities in the Arab world were firmly entrenched and seemed immune to upheaval and dispersal.

Cowles, a Bostonian currently living in Montreal, has a sharp, artistic eye, and it was reflected in his stark ensemble of photographs.

I was struck by a photograph of a synagogue building in Marrakech which, uncannily, resembled a grand Roman ruin; of a shrine in Ouazzane where the headstones, flush with the ground, lay under the shade of a great old tree; of the graceful arches of Cairo's Ben Ezra shul; of a dusty lane in a Moroccan mellah (Jewish quarter).

Consisting of clandestine brochures, underground leaflets, posters and pictures, the Jewish Labor Bund exhibit was redolent of tradition and modernity and of revolution and counter-revolution.

Founded in Vilna in 1897, the Bund was inextricably associated with the struggle for socialism and workers' rights, the battle against anti-Semitism, and the demand for Jewish national autonomy.

Banned and repressed by Russian czars, Soviet commissars and Polish generals, the Bund was, nevertheless, a formidable force for almost five decades. It reached an apotheosis of influence in Poland, where its network of unions, schools, libraries and periodicals were renowned.

During the dark years of the Holocaust, Bundists played an important role in the Warsaw ghetto uprising.

Dissolved in Poland after World War II, the Bund faded into the mists of history. But in North America, Bundists were prominent in the Workmen's Circle and the Jewish Labor Committee, and trade unionists like David Dubinsky and Sidney Hillman were Bundists at heart.

Its achievements are its legacy.

Humility and compassion

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Among the readings this month one finds the story of the city of Sodom, and Lot and his family.

Lot, Abraham's nephew, has settled in Sodom and raised his family among its inhabitants. God reveals to Abraham that there is a tremendous outcry from Sodom and if that outcry is a reflection of the suffering in the city, God is prepared to destroy the region with all its inhabitants.

There is a famous dialogue in the text where Abraham bargains with God in an attempt to rescue the inhabitants of the region. Ultimately, the bargain results in an agreement: if ten righteous people can be found, God will spare the entire region for the sake of those righteous.

This deal introduces a new concept of good and evil. Logically one would assume that Abraham would argue for saving the righteous people alone. In other words, should God find ten righteous individuals, those ten should be spared because of their righteousness.

Yet Abraham is arguing for a perspective that does not equate good and evil but rather elevates righteousness above evil. The value of righteous people is weighed over and above the wickedness of evil. If ten people are found, the entire region will be saved. The righteousness of those ten is sufficient to balance the wickedness of the countless masses.

And yet the evil of Sodom takes many forms.

As the story progresses, Lot, his two daughters and his wife are removed from the city before it is destroyed. The assumption being that this small handful of individuals is deemed righteous and are therefore being saved.

As they depart the city they are instructed not to look back but Lot's wife turns and looks upon Sodom as it is being destroyed. The text conveys that because she looked back she is turned into a pillar of salt, frozen for all time.

But what is the tremendous evil that has been committed by Lot's wife that removes her from the category of the righteous? What form of evil is a mere backward glance?

To understand the implications of her action we must remember the context. Lot's wife has arrived at a safe distance, far from the destruction taking place. From her safe vantage point she is turning to observe the suffering of others.

Whether evil or not, the people of Sodom are enduring tremendous suffering and it is wrong to observe that suffering without attempting to assist. We might compare her actions to the phenomenon of slowing down on the highway to view the traffic accident and the carnage of suffering it entails – and then driving off again.

To view suffering from a safe haven and not respond to that suffering is to step outside of righteousness. If we cannot help, we must never flaunt our circumstances before those less fortunate.

If righteousness is to be valued as stronger than evil, able to sustain evil, then it must include humility and compassion. We find neither attribute in Lot's wife.

Abraham argued for the lives of the wicked; Lot and his daughters looked forward because they could not help; Lot's wife passively observed suffering and carried Sodom within her.

Reb Shlomo in song, story

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last time, we began our look at the life of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach in light of his fifth yahrzeit, which is being commemorated this week. This week, Reb Shlomo in song and story.

There are many sites that include excerpts of Rabbi Carlebach's music [http://www.shamash.org/judaica/rebshlomo/audio/index.html] but best place I've come across is at 613.org [http://www.613.org/music/niggun.html]. In addition to his songs, there are even some full-length concerts at this site and some selections of other people performing the rabbi's work.

And if you have a fast Internet connection, there are some real treats here. There's an hour-long video of a concert he gave in Russia in 1989 and another video of Rabbi Carlebach leading the davening on Hoshanah Rabah, the final day of Sukkot.

In 1997, Rabbi Carlebach's yahrzeit was observed in story and song by the Happy Minyan of Los Angeles [http://www.happyminyan.org/]. At the 613.org site, you can listen in as people recount stories of the rabbi's kindness. For example, there was the time that, due to a last-minute cancellation, Rabbi Carlebach agreed to appear at a Lag b'Omer concert with only a day's notice. After the concert, the rabbi was approached by a member of the audience and asked for a blessing for parnasah (employment). When the man explained his dire straits, the rabbi reached into his pocket and handed over his entire appearance fee of $2,700.

During his lifetime, Rabbi Carlebach produced a large number of commercial books, videos and CDs, many of which can be ordered online. A couple of sites which carry a large assortment are Zionbooks [http://www.zionbooks.com/carlbach.htm], and JewishMusic [http://www.jewishmusic.com/scaall.htm]. I particularly like the JewishMusic site since since it includes generous online excerpts from the CDs. Don't miss it.

Neshama Carlebach has a thriving career, performing both original tunes and ones penned by her father [http://www.shamash.org/judaica/rebshlomo/audio/index.html]. Many of the articles about Neshama also address the controversy over the prohibition of Jewish men listening to a woman's singing voice. For more, see the Yeshiva University Commentator [http://www.yucommentator.com/v63i4/culture/neshama.shtml] and the Jewish Communications Network [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/paper/Article.asp?ArticleID=1708].

If you want to learn to play some of Rabbi Carlebach's music yourself, then take a look at the Beis Medrash Gavoha D'Reb Shlomo [http://www.geocities.com/CollegePark/Lab/7613/]. You can find the guitar chords to some of his biggest hits. (Note: There is an error with this page. After it finishes loading, it disappears. To get around the problem, tap your browser's "Stop" button just before the page finishes loading.)

Just how good a composer was Rabbi Carlebach? At JewishMusic.com, Velvel Pasternak takes a critical look at the creative output of Rabbi Carlebach and comes up with a fascinating analysis [http://www.jewishmusic.com/articl01.htm].

"As a composer Shlomo was certainly not in the company of great folk composers such as Stephen Foster. As a singer he never entered the ranks of the vocally cultured Jan Peerce or Richard Tucker. And as a guitarist, Shlomo was the first to admit that he had not perfected the instrument. And yet!... and yet!...and yet! his singing, his melodies, along with his performances and personal involvement with amcha (the people), exerted a major musical as well as Judaic influence on several generations of Jews world wide. The entire Jewish community owes Shlomo a great and sincere debt of gratitude."

Stranger in a strange land

By MELANIE TAKEFMAN
Special to The CJN

I arrived in Strasbourg, France, with two suitcases, a dormant knowledge of French and the address of a Jewish dorm.

Guest Voices

I was a stranger in a strange land: I didn't know a soul and everyone I cared about was half a world away. I was petrified.

When I decided to study in France for a year, I knew that it would be difficult to adjust to a new culture, make new friends and try to get an education – all at the same time. I reserved a room in the ORT dorm (a quasi-Hillel house) in hopes of finding familiarity amidst the unknown.

At first, what I found in Strasbourg was at most vaguely reminiscent of my Jewish existence in Montreal. The sukkah erected four floors below my room, for example, was a reassuring sight.

Eating dinner in it on Friday night was a different story. I was part of the small Ashkenazi minority present and the prayers and songs were sung with different pronunciations and melodies.

Furthermore, believing that Montreal's Jewish community was particularly Orthodox, I thought that I would find a more liberal stream of Judaism in France. However, when I enquired about where I might find a synagogue with mixed seating, one man asked, "Sephardim and Ashkenazim together?" He then told me to go the cathedral.

Similarly, as most of my views comprise a leftist/feminist slant, I have never held the Lubavitch in high esteem. I feel they treat women unfairly and they have not adapted adequately to the 20th century.

Nevertheless, on erev Simchat Torah, I found myself seated in a small room watching 100 drunk men dance with Torahs. I stayed, reluctantly, because one young woman, smiling knowingly, promised me that we, too, would get our chance to dance.

Indeed, she had the last laugh, because that night, I had the time of my life. The party lasted well into the next day.

Sephardi and Ashkenazi women danced together until no one could breathe, and sang until no one could talk. I didn't know all the dance steps or the words to all the songs. Other people didn't either. We improvised and no one cared.

Although everyone in Strasbourg has been very helpful and kind (contrary to the stereotype that the French are unfriendly), the night with the Lubavitch community was the first time that I did not feel like a stranger.

I was accepted as a Jew (wearing pants!), no questions asked.

I witnessed more joy than I had ever seen and was welcomed with more genuine warmth than ever before. Ironically, the party could have taken place anywhere in the world and things would not have been much different.

So while I doubt that I will throw out my short skirts and feminist ideals any time soon, the Lubavitch taught me an important lesson: No matter where you are, or who you're with, Jewish ecstasy is universal.

Exploring religious minhag rules

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A line must be drawn between what is a genuine religious minhag, custom, and what is "a bobeh meiseh," says Rabbi Hershel Schachter.

Rabbi Schachter, a rosh yeshiva and rosh kolel at Rabbi Itzchak Elchanan Theological Seminary, the rabbinical arm of Yeshiva University, was speaking at the inaugural lecture of the Mizrachi of Canada adult education program.

There is even a difference between how you deal with a custom of long standing and one established recently, he said.

In a talk that was more like a shiur (a Torah class) than a lecture, Rabbi Schachter's topics ranged from subjects relating to pre-Talmud times to questions arising from the creation of the modern state of Israel.

When, for instance, one says the shorter Hallel on Pesach and Rosh Chodesh, is that a law or a custom? In other words, should one say a blessing before it or not?

He asked if a woman should light candles before Yom Kippur, since it appears to be more of a widely practised custom than a law. The Ashkenazi custom, Rabbi Schachter said, is that one should follow such a custom.

One must distinguish between a custom that is valid and one that is, as he described it, "shtuss," silliness. For instance, one is obligated to follow a custom that is dictated by the rabbis, such as observing two days of yom tov outside of Israel, as opposed to, for instance, standing on one's head every Sunday.

How about adding to a law in the Torah, such as not just reading the Torah, but kissing it? The Talmud says that that is acceptable, Rabbi Schachter said, as long as it is widely practised in that community.

And what about the issue of whether one should recite Hallel on Yom Ha'atzmaut?

There are some sins for which no tshuvah, repentance, is possible. One of these, the rabbi said, is to deliberately break away from the community. An example would be if a community fast is called because of a serious situation in Israel, and only one person refuses. That is a sin, he said.

Rabbis must not be as particular about ruling on rabbinically ordained minhagim as they are with laws given in the Torah, he stressed. For instance, when there was a famine during Pesach, and the only food available was kitniyot, beans and grains not eaten by Ashkenazi Jews, the rabbis allowed it to be eaten.

A minhag is an obligation, he concluded, only when it has something to do with the fulfilment of a mitzvah.

The evening marked the first formal appearance of Jerry Rosenfeld as the incoming president of Toronto Mizrachi.

Rabbi Schachter's speech, Rosenfeld said, was the inaugural shiur of the new Mizrachi Torah Institute, a kolel that would offer a number of classes on Torah and Talmud at Or Chaim Yeshiva on Armour Boulevard.

*And Behold, It Was Very Good **

When I hug the rocky hill and peer into the green awe of Holy of Holies,
in perfect repose
yet forgetting nothing,
neither Noah's flood nor Abraham's continued sacrifice nor the fiery rain of the mushroom apocalypse, still I laugh
sensing what He felt when on the seventh day
He rested,
blessing life -

"And behold, it was very good."

Polish organization Zegota helped Jews during the war

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The last surviving founder of Zegota, a Polish organization that helped Jews during World War II, spoke movingly of his risky wartime experiences at a recent Toronto lecture.

"Of course I was terrified," recalled 77-year-old Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, a Polish senator and former foreign minister who has been designated as Righteous Among the Nations. "[But] where is it written that if you're afraid, you should do nothing?"

Zegota, the organization he co-founded in 1942, provided money and thousands of false documents, with the help of the Polish government in exile. Zegota's members, who numbered only a few dozen, also placed Jewish children with families or in orphanages.

Unfortunately, the organization's work represented "only a small drop in an ocean of need," said Bartoszewski in a 30-minute film preceding his talk.

Speaking at Beth Habonim Synagogue under the joint auspices of the congregation, March of the Living and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Bartoszewski attributed his actions to the simple fact that he was raised by "wise and very decent parents."

Although Zegota had some Jewish members, Bartoszewski had no Jewish relatives.

Having been imprisoned for eight months in Auschwitz at the beginning of the war, he was fully aware of the risks posed by his clandestine work.

The day-to-day work of Zegota was not at all romantic, he said. It consisted of taking medications to Jewish people, bringing them money, helping them get from one place to another, and "taking care of them in small ways and big ways."

Wladyslaw Bartoszewski

Although he spoke in German (because many of Habonim's founders were German speakers), the animated Bartoszewski didn't really need the translator at his side to convey the deep emotions that underscored his talk.

Before he became involved with Zegota and after his release from Auschwitz, Bartoszewski had consulted a priest to ask how God could allow such terrible things to happen.

The priest told him that, having seen human suffering, it was up to him to relieve it.

"One didn't always know what the best action was," Bartoszewski recalled. Sometimes it appeared Zegota's efforts were in vain when someone was captured after months under the organization's protective wing.

But after the war, Bartoszewski and his peers experienced the "joy" of meeting people they'd been able to save.

Zegota's work was made more difficult by Polish collaborators. "We did have collaboration in Poland," admitted Bartoszewski, who himself was denounced to the Gestapo in an anonymous letter. "This was bad enough, without having an official collaborating government."

The attitude of Poles toward Jews still hits raw nerves in the Jewish community. Likewise for the Polish community, when confronted with accusations of Polish anti-Semitism.

In fact, early in the evening, Beth Habonim president David Goldfarb asked the audience of over 250 people to "refrain from some of the often bitter criticism" about Polish-Jewish relations.

The senator, who received 470,000 votes (the second-largest number among 100 Polish senators), told the audience their applause for that revelation was "for the Polish people much more than for me, because by their vote they are demonstrating that they are not chauvinistic. They do remember, and recognize a person such as myself, and will vote for the values I stand for."

Piotr Wrobel, chair of Polish history at the University of Toronto, noted in an introductory address that Jews lived in Poland for 1,000 years. Poles were also condemned to death by the Nazis, he mentioned later.

"When Poland was rich and powerful, the situation of the Jews was good as well," he said, making particular reference to the 17th century and to "centuries of good co-operation... It was no coincidence that so many Jews lived in Poland."

Book fair celebrates local talent

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 23rd annual Jewish Book Fair, running Nov. 6 to 14 at the Leah Posluns Theatre, is a celebration of local talent this year, says its director, Helen Redner.

Among the local authors will be Al Waxman, who will speak on his autobiography That's What I Am, Harry Rasky speaking on the Three Harry's, and singer Malka Marom, of Malka and Joso, who will speak on her new book, Sulha.

Other local authors include Harold Troper, Lillian Nattel, Ernest Raab, Liba Scheier, Alan Borovoy, David Layton, Elyse Friedman, and Evan Solomon. There are authors from elsewhere, but we are concentrating on local authors this year.

"It is very much a local celebration," says Redner, who has directed the fair for 20 years.

The fair, which runs with the help of about 150 volunteers, "started big 23 years ago and stayed big. It features more than 2,000 books, all with Jewish content. We have a book committee that spends a good part of the year pouring over every conceivable piece of material on Jewish publications. We're constantly getting material, and the planning never stops," she says.

Opening night, Rabbi Donniel Hartman will speak on A Heart of Many Rooms: Celebrating the Many Voices Within Judaism, a book written by his father Rabbi David Hartman. "I believe he has a message of overwhelming importance on Jewish pluralism. We are expecting to draw a large crowd," says Redner.

For children, Rhea Tregebov author of What-If Sara, will speak on Nov. 8, a P.D. day for Hebrew day school students, and Kathy Kacer will speak on her book, Gabi's Dresser. "The book is about the author's mother, who survived the Holocaust hiding in a dresser. That same dresser will actually be there with the author, and children will be given the opportunity to sit in it to see how the mother felt," says Redner.

Author Lucille de Saint-Andre, who wrote Bye-Bye, Baden, about the deportation of Jews from Baden, and who recently signed film rights to the book, will appear on stage with Morris Granatstein, who is over 90 years old. He is author of Welcome to the Year 2000 and Other Poems and My City Lodz.

Peace Now sees 'bloody, twisted road' to peace

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Most Israelis believe a Palestinian state is inevitable, says the founder and political director of American Friends for Peace Now.

"The fact that there will be a Palestinian state no longer sticks in the throats of Israeli leaders," Mark Rosenblum said at a recent lecture held at Holy Blossom Temple.

Rosenblum said however, that a tempered utopia lies ahead. "I have a reduced sense of expectation when I think of the peace that is emerging.

"It will not be a linear move to peace; it will be a bloody, twisted road."

Prime Minister Ehud Barak inherited a strategic liability when he was elected, said Rosenblum. "He faces an upsurge in terrorism because he is serious about moving the peace process forward. Any real progress in peace means an attempt to stop the peace process."

On the other hand, Rosenblum said, former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu "managed to develop a win-win situation with regards to terrorism.

"Terrorism diminished during his term because two of the primary terrorist groups believed that there was no longer a threat of emerging peace.

"They wanted a Palestinian state in place of Israel, and they saw Netanyahu as an ally. This is in direct contrast to the uphill battle faced by Barak."

Netanyahu used terrorism as a reason to have no further withdrawals from the territories, said Rosenblum. "This was what he really wanted; he had a win-win situation."

Another setback for Barak, said Rosenblum, is that the money he had counted on from U.S. President Bill Clinton, is not forthcoming. "The president vetoed a package that included money to Israel, and this is devastating for Barak. He needs the money desperately."

Good news on the road to peace, said Rosenblum, is that Barak has resolved a four-year battle about the safe passageway between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. "Without this connection, there is little chance of the economic development of Palestinian economy. Economic viability is important for the evolution of a Palestinian entity."

Barak has a vision of making peace with the Palestinians in two giant steps, said Rosenblum. "Between now and February 2000, he intends to have a declaration of principles on every issue involved. By September 2000, he expects to have the final status agreement in place. This is a vision he sees possible."

The hardest issue to resolve, he said, is Jerusalem. "[Even though] Palestinians and Israelis have said that it is the eternal undivided capital, there is a compromise.

"Most Israelis do not travel into east Jerusalem where the Palestinians live; most Israelis have never heard of the 20 Arab villages, and they never go there.

"The premise is that Jerusalem is not the undivided capital. There are places where Jews do not go. Vital services are taking place by the Palestinians in these areas, and there is the possibility of providing Palestinians with municipal control of the services. There are possibilities of a final status understanding."

The prime minister wants to win peace without losing the people, said Rosenblum. "He wants peace with a broad coalition."

"Life Is Beautiful" — Debate and Discussion

This Oscar-winning film evokes a multitude of views and strong emotions.
It provokes all sorts of controversial questions about the representation of the Holocaust in cinema:

- Can it be appropriately treated in comic form?
- Do its historical inaccuracies necessarily lead to trivialization?
- Is Roberto Benigni being naïve by creating what he calls a "fable" about the Holocaust?

Orthodox rabbi helps to unite Jews, non-Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein is a little unorthodox, for an Orthodox rabbi.

The Chicago-based founder and president of an organization aimed at fostering understanding and co-operation between Jews and Christians – particularly evangelical Christians – Rabbi Eckstein has spent the past 16 years building bridges between the two communities.

An alumnus of Yeshiva University and Columbia University with post-graduate degrees in the philosophy of religion and Jewish philosophy, he has travelled to China to help Christians suffering from religious persecution, and to numerous other countries in his work.

Over the past four years, his organization, the International Fellowship of Christians and Jews (IFCJ), has given $20 million US, primarily from Christian donors, to the Jewish Agency.

Among those with whom Rabbi Eckstein engages in dialogue is the Rev. Jerry Falwell, the controversial right-wing Christian leader.

The rabbi – a youthful 48-year-old with a low-key, articulate speaking manner – was in Toronto recently to meet informally with local Jewish community leaders and with Micha Feldman, who has been involved in rescuing over 70,000 Ethiopian Jews.

Although the IFCJ does not have a presence in Canada, Rabbi Eckstein expects it will have a Canadian tax exemption number by the end of the year.

The American-born rabbi has a personal connection to this country going back many years. He spent most of his childhood in Ottawa, where his father, Rabbi Simon Eckstein (a pretty traditional Orthodox rabbi, according to the son), served the community. Rabbi Eckstein senior now lives in Florida.

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein has been criticized for his ties with evangelical Christians, but for the most part not by his Orthodox colleagues, he says.

Rabbi Eckstein insists he will not work with anyone who targets Jews for conversion. "That's been the line of demarcation."

In his own work, his motto has been: "Co-operate whenever possible, oppose whenever necessary, teach and sensitize at all times."

Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein

Although his brand of dialogue is "clearly not something Orthodox rabbis pursue or engage in," he feels he's a "curiosity" rather than a pariah in the Orthodox world.

The rabbi defines himself as part of the modern Orthodox movement. He won't go so far as to say he's on the fringe, but admits he no longer finds it "relevant" whether he's accepted by his mainstream colleagues.

"I believe deeply in what I do," he said. "I do what's right."

The IFCJ, Rabbi Eckstein stressed, is a partnership, not a Jewish organization to facilitate a Christian response.

With 30 staff and over 140,000 supporters, mostly in the United States, the organization has strongly backed Jewish causes, such as its Isaiah 58 program, which provides money to feed elderly Jews in the former Soviet Union and On Wings of Eagles, which funds Jewish aliyah from the FSU.

Funding is "heavily Christian" at the moment. The organization provides Christians who wish to help Israel with a tangible, non-missionary vehicle with which to do so, the rabbi explained.

Early in his career, Rabbi Eckstein reached a turning point when he was sent to Skokie, Ill., to try to rally the non-Jewish community against a neo-Nazi march that became a cause célèbre at the time. The rabbi was then national co-director of interreligious affairs for the Anti-Defamation League.

His mission led him to Wheaton College – a hub of evangelical life – where he met with the head of the Bible department.

"He was a very reasonable, sophisticated guy," recalled Rabbi Eckstein. "He dispelled immediately the stereotypes that I had of evangelicals at the time – that they were rednecks, anti-Semites, not intelligent."

Their meeting led to what Rabbi Eckstein believes was the first evangelical-Jewish conference in the United States. Participants included Orthodox, Conservative and Reform rabbis.

Rabbi Eckstein has written five books, including one called Understanding Evangelicals: A Guide for the Jewish Community. He believes that "we Jews who have ourselves been objects of prejudice and stereotyping have a prime obligation not to do the same vis-a-vis others."

A new project, and one of the rabbi's major challenges, he believes, is to work on Jewish attitudes towards Christians.

Breast cancer care, research receives a $1 million boost

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Breast cancer care and research was given a major boost in Toronto, thanks to a gift of over a million dollars from philanthropist Anne Tanenbaum, herself a cancer survivor.

A $500,000 donation will fund the relocation, expansion and refurbishing of the Anne Tanenbaum Chemotherapy Centre at the Leslie Street site of North York General Hospital. Slated for completion in 2001, the new centre will expand chemotherapy space from 1,250 to 4,470 square feet.

The gift will also help purchase a new technology called FISH (fluorescence in situ hybridization) which determines whether a woman has an abnormally high quantity of a gene called HER-2/neu. People with that gene tend to have a worse survival rate than others and require a more aggressive treatment approach.

A new drug, Herceptin, has shown to be of help to those with HER-2/neu. FISH technology will enable Herceptin, a very expensive medication, to be used where it will be most beneficial.

A media release says that North York General Hospital is the only hospital in Toronto to routinely use FISH technology on all breast cancer patients.

The institution also houses the Bank of Montreal/Nesbitt Burns Breast Diagnosis Centre and the Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg Familial Breast Cancer Clinic.

Tanenbaum also gave $250,000 each to Mount Sinai and Princess Margaret hospitals for digital mammography units.

An additional $75,000 gift to the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation will be used to establish the Anne Tanenbaum Breast Diagnosis Fellowship in Digital Mammography, and to translate educational material into French.

IDF to maintain superiority: former IAF chief

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel will maintain its military superiority over the Arabs for the foreseeable future, says the former commander of the Israeli Air Force.

"Our strength depends on people and weapon systems," said Amos Lapidot in an interview. "If our enemies have the same equipment as us, then we don't have any advantage.

"The difference is the human factor. Those who are more educated, intelligent and creative make better use of equipment."

Lapidot, president of the Technion for the past year, questioned a recent report in which the current commander of the Israeli Air Force, Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu, was quoted as saying that Israel was losing its "qualitative edge" as advanced weaponry reaches Arab armies.

"I can't believe he said that," declared Lapidot, who commanded the air force from 1982-87. Shown an Israeli newspaper clipping confirming Ben-Eliahu's statement, Lapidot said, "He must have been misinterpreted."

A combat pilot from 1954 to 1975, Lapidot said that non-conventional weapons will be deployed in the next Arab-Israeli war, should one occur.

"Non-conventional warfare," he warned, "should be taken into account in the future."

The Arabs, he suggested, possess chemical and biological, but not nuclear, weapons. He feigned ignorance of Israel's widely reported nuclear capability.

Amos Lapidot

"We have many enemies, countries that want us to fade away, countries that are not exactly democratic and ruled by totalitarian regimes," said Lapidot, listing Iraq, Syria and Iran as Israel's chief adversaries.

Claiming that the Israeli Air Force is still the best in the Middle East, he observed, "It's our deterrent force, our strategic long arm. It's quite in good shape."

Lapidot, who was commander when Israel bombed PLO headquarters in Tunisia in 1985, said that Israel's recent acquisition of 25 American-built F-15I strike aircraft increases the air force's potency.

"The F-15I has two advantages over the old F-15: better night- time systems and a much longer range," he explained.

The F-15I, at $84 million (US) a piece, has a range of 1,450 kilometres, and can fly as far west as Libya and as far east as Iran.

A squadron commander during the Six Day War and a wing commander during the Yom Kippur War, Lapidot said that air supremacy alone is insufficient.

Israel must also achieve dominance in space. "There are a lot of strategic advantages to that. During the Gulf War, we received real-time information from U.S. satellites in space."

The Arrow anti-missile system, which is currently in development and has been tested, is based on space technology, said Lapidot, who holds degrees in mathematics and engineering economic systems from Tel Aviv University and Stanford University, respectively.

Since the Arrow is not as yet operational, Israel is "quite vulnerable" to an Arab missile attack, he acknowledged.

"But we don't expect a war to break out tomorrow. In the meantime, we're preparing solutions."

The Arrow should be able to fend off five to 10, but not hundreds of Arab missiles fired simultaneously, he disclosed.

Lapidot, head of the Lavi aircraft project from 1981-82, regrets its cancellation. Designed to be Israel's home-grown answer to the F-15, the Lavi was cancelled in 1987.

"It was an excellent platform to develop our defence and high-tech industry, the cornerstones of our economy. It would have created 10,000 to 15,000 new jobs."

In his view, the politicians responsible for the Lavi's demise were neither far-sighted nor brave.

The Lavi, he believes, would have been the equal of the F-16, manufactured in the United States and used by Israel. "It was more tailor-made for our exact needs, and some of its systems were more advanced than the F-16s."

Asked about the fate of Ron Arad, an Israeli navigator who fell into Arab hands after his plane was shot down in southern Lebanon in 1986, Lapidot said, "No one knows where he is. I'm not even sure he's alive. I'm very pessimistic."

He cast doubt on reports that Arad is a captive of Iran. "It's hard to believe that he could be held by an established government and no one would know about it. It's not reasonable or logical."

Lapidot, who flies recreational aircraft today, is skeptical that the Israeli Air Force would have been more broadly effective against Iraq during the Gulf War than the United States and its allies had it not been grounded.

"On the other hand," he added, "we had tactics of our own and could have done some things differently and more effectively."

Commenting on the possibility of females flying combat missions for the Israeli Air Force one day, Lapidot said he has no doubts that women are as capable as men.

However, he noted, Israel's Western culture is adverse to the notion of women fighting on the front lines. And since women bear children and raise families, and given the $1 million cost of training a pilot, the air force may think twice before embracing the idea.

Lapidot was here and in Montreal to promote the Technion, Israel's technical university in Haifa.

Shaar Shalom Synagogue celebrating 25th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Sandy and David Galet bought a house in a predominately non-Jewish area in 1973, Sandy decided the only way she'd make the move was if she could start a shul nearby.

About a week before Christmas, she "did the Jewish walk" in the Don Mills Road and Finch Avenue area, waiting until darkness fell.

"I went to every house that didn't have Christmas lights, and snuck up to the front door to see if they had a mezuzah," she told The CJN recently.

In January 1974 the Galets – who had four young children – hosted a meeting for about a dozen people, with Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue as adviser.

Did Galet have any idea that her project might become an established synagogue with almost 600 families? "Never in my life!" she said.

The congregation that grew out of that meeting – Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue – celebrates its 25th anniversary this year.

An affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Shaar Shalom is still known as a younger congregation, although a year-old seniors' group of about 15 to 20 people meets monthly for lunch and study with the rabbi.

Shul president Sam Chaim, 50, estimates he's "maybe just a touch over the average age." He and his wife Roz joined in 1982 when their three children – now in their late teens and early 20s – were small.

Like the Chaim children, Shaar Shalom's congregational family is growing up. "We're just starting to enjoy some weddings, and our bar/bat mitzvah level [40 to 50 a year] has come down," noted Chaim.

Although he appreciates the religious and ritual aspects of synagogue life, Chaim believes the social aspect also plays an important role.

The Chaims, who are originally from Montreal, found their social circle "started to jell" when they became involved with Shaar Shalom, which has a sizable number of ex-Montrealers and South Africans. "We even have some Torontonians," Chaim quipped.

He credited shul founders for their vision 25 years ago.

Shaar Shalom is a "vibrant Conservative synagogue with all of the basic needs of a [congregation]," said Rabbi Martin Berman, spiritual leader of the traditional Conservative congregation since 1994.

High Holy Day services are held at two locations on-site as well as at Minkler Auditorium. There are brotherhood, sisterhood, adult education and youth programs, and a Hebrew school with over 200 students.

Rabbi Martin Berman

Among Rabbi Berman's ideas aimed at youth and family education was a havdalah service held at the David Dunlap Observatory. "We're looking to do other types of programs like that," he said.

In the early years, the only youth program consisted of children playing in the family room of Judy and Ira Abraham's house in the northeastern part of North York, while Saturday morning services took place in their basement. For the High Holy Days, larger premises were rented.

"I think we only had 36 chairs," recalls Judy Abraham of the home-based services when her oldest son was a baby. "There was the odd time we'd have to go knock on doors and drag men out for a minyan."

Sometimes Judy's husband, who travelled frequently, would sleep in, and someone would holler, "Could Ira come down?"

The Abrahams, natives of Nova Scotia, hosted services for four years, until they moved back to Halifax temporarily. The congregation then rented a room at Markham Place (now the Shops on Steeles at 404).

When the Abrahams moved back to Toronto after eight years away, the changes at Shaar Shalom were "almost like a miracle," Judy said. "Now it's like a big city shul," she added, somewhat wistfully.

The synagogue, located at Don Mills Road and Simonston Boulevard, opened in 1980, with membership approaching 100 families. Services were held in what is now the social hall of the building. Three phases of construction were completed in 1991.

In 1981 Rabbi Robert Binder became Shaar Shalom's first full-time rabbi. He was preceded by Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg, who was affiliated briefly with the congregation, and followed by Rabbi Sheldon Korn in 1983, and Rabbi Howard Markose in 1988.

To get the shul up and running required a lot of fundraising, recalls Carolyn Bowman. "In the beginning, the money was used to pay basic things like the gas bill."

She and husband Michael joined in 1991 with their two children, now teenagers, after they moved into the area. Although they knew nobody at Shaar Shalom, they found it "very haimish, very warm and inviting," Carolyn said.

Becoming involved in the shul – she is recording secretary of the congregation and immediate past sisterhood president – has taught her a lot about Judaism, she added.

This summer Bowman oversaw the publication of a 25th anniversary calendar, the synagogue's most recent fundraiser and a "labor of love." Money raised for the anniversary will be earmarked for youth projects, Bowman said.

Other anniversary year events include a celebration (details yet to be finalized) and an adult education program. Earlier this year, the congregation raised $15,000 at an anniversary golf tournament.

The slogan at the shul opening, said Bowman, was "A Dream Fulfilled." This year, on the calendar, an updated slogan reads, "The Dream Continues."

Keren Hayesod women's head calls for more olim

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nava Rubenzadeh, international president of women's divisions of Keren Hayesod visited Canada recently to share her vision.

"I would like each woman's division from [around the world] to sponsor a planeload of olim. My dream is to have each plane arrive in Israel at the same moment," said Rubenzadeh, who was born and raised in Israel, but married and moved to Argentina 36 years ago.

Keren Hayesod, which began in 1920, is the central campaign for Israel in all Diaspora countries except the United States. Its aim is to help realize the objectives of the Zionist movement, and raise funds for immigration, absorption and other national priorities. The organization has 41 women's divisions in 16 countries.

Nava Rubenzadeh (left), international president of women's divisions of Keren Hayesod, presents a leadership award to Linda Nadolny of Ottawa at the organization's recent meetings held in Israel.

The Argentinian division, which was formed 21 years ago, has already committed to sponsor a planeload of olim from its own country, and Chile's division has committed to sponsor olim from Russia, she said.

"Now I would like to see Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal do the same. I envision planeloads arriving from Europe, South America, Australia and Canada."

She is also here, she said, to share ideas with other women's divisions. "One of our main goals is to transmit Jewish values to our children and grandchildren in order to continue our tradition. We believe that women can do a lot for the Jewish community and for continuity."

Worldwide, she said, women contribute between 10 and 12 percent of the money that goes to Keren Hayesod.

Argentina, which has a population of about 200,000 Jews, mostly in Buenos Aires, has recently seen aliyah increase in its country by about 400 percent, she said. "We raise the money, and emissaries from the Jewish Agency prepare them for emigration. Last June, we went to Israel with 100 olim from Argentina and Latin America.

Teenage volunteers

"On the trip were about 15 teenage volunteers who lived for one week with teenage olim on a special program. When they came back to Argentina they were our emissaries."

Teenagers and young adults who go on an Israel Experience program from Argentina spend two days in a residential high school for immigrants, she said. "We want them to experience Israel as an immigrant does. Our goal is to have as many young people as possible make aliyah."

Argentinian immigrants fare well in Israel, she said, because Argentina has a strong Zionist community and children generally receive a solid Jewish education. "The kids are brought up with Zionism."

Referring to the terrorist attacks in Argentina that "shook the country," Rubenzadeh said that anti-Semitism is everywhere. "The Diaspora must work together and be strong together. Our centrality must be Israel. If we bring in more olim, Israel will be stronger."

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

It may only be a symptom of the approaching millennium, but the issue of the role of religion in society has been a real buzz topic since parliamentarians returned to the Hill.

Especially noteworthy were two events: the first, a speech by Preston Manning; the second, a conference at Queen's University focusing specifically on the place of religion in public policy.

Manning's speech was treated as a return to the fold by some, following his bruising and ultimately unrequited courtship of the Joe Clark Tories. Others saw it more as a result of a personal epiphany. That is, Manning had finally realized that his strong and earnest religious beliefs had to serve as the basis of any political ideology to which he could subscribe.

In the "days of spin" following Manning's speech, Reformers see-sawed between private exuberance and public "contextualizing" of their leader's remarks.

Both promoters and critics of "the Manning doctrine" point to the centrality of Christian values as the source of their reactions. That, however, would be misleading.

More than 80 percent of Canadians claim to be followers of some Christian denomination, and polls have consistently pointed to a steady rise in personal religious affiliation. Logically, the kind of things Preston Manning is talking about should resonate positively with the majority of Canadians. Why then do so many reject his message?

One wise journalist offered two thoughtful observations. First, a majority of Canadians – including Christian Canadians – are troubled by the selectivity of the "Christian values" Manning has chosen to shape his political platform.

The corollary is that those values that do inform one's policies cannot be applied in a selective fashion without raising suspicions about the underlying agenda.

So juxtaposing the compassionate position adopted by Reformers regarding the victims of hepatitis-C tainted blood with Manning's harsh recommendations regarding the many helpless refugees that somehow make it to Canada, simply sets off alarms in many people's minds.

The one thing that is not selective, however, is the lesson that can be drawn for anyone in any faith community…including the Jewish community. Namely, that religion-based values cannot be chosen or applied using the principle of "multiple choice."

Tulip bulbs to be planted

TORONTO — In memory of 1.5 million children who were victims of the Holocaust, students from the Toronto Board of Education's Brown School and Deerpark Public School will plant a special bed of 800 Anne Frank Tulip Bulbs in a ceremony on Nov. 1 at 1 p.m.

This is the 11th year that special Anne Frank Bulbs will be planted in the Amsterdam Park at Avenue Road and St. Clair Avenue since then-mayor, Art Eggleton, proclaimed Anne Frank Day on Nov. 2, 1989.

Assisting the children will be the consul general of the Netherlands, Hendrik Kroon; the consul general of Israel, Jehudi Kinar; MPPs; city officials; members of the Jewish and Dutch-Canadian community of Toronto; and members of the Royal Canadian Legion.

In preparing the students, special attention has been given to the heroic efforts of the Allied armies in the liberation of Europe and in particular, the Canadian armies who liberated Holland.

They were one month too late for Anne Frank, who died in the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, but a few of those attending the planting will remember those soldiers and will never forget their sacrifice.

The event is co-sponsored by the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Dutch/Canadian Association of Greater Toronto.

Golda Koschitzky to receive honorary degree

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 70 years after finishing her formal education, Golda Koschitzky will be awarded an honorary doctorate from York University at the Nov. 5 convocation.

The great-grandmother, a Polish-born Jew, finished Grade 12 in the early '20s.

She had dreams of earning a teachers' degree, but her home town, Lutowiska, did not have a college.

Golda wanted to study in Vienna, but her parents did not want her going to a big city.

For about five years, she continued her studies privately with her three older cousins and a teacher, learning about history, geography, mathematics and other subjects, trying to duplicate what was learned in college.

But she never earned a post-secondary school degree.

In 1933, she married Israel Koschitzky and they had two sons, Saul and Henry.

In the midst of the Holocaust, the family was deported from their native Poland to Siberia and later lived in Russia, Poland and Germany.

In 1948, they came to Canada as "penniless immigrants, not knowing the country, not knowing the language, and working their way up to being able to make a major contribution to Canadian society," said Michael Brown, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Golda Koschitzky

The family lived in Winnipeg for a year, moved to Calgary for 10 years and then settled in Toronto.

The Koschitzky family became known for its commitment to the Jewish community and its contribution to Jewish education.

"They are at the forefront of Jewish philanthropy in this country," said Michael Brown.

The Koschitzkys were among the founders of Toronto's Bnei Akiva Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot Girls School, and they donated a mikvah on Sheppard Avenue, west of Bathurst, called The Mikvah Society for Family Sanctity.

Family members have filled important roles in Jewish organizations.

Mira Koschitzky, one of Golda's daughter-in-laws, is the former national executive chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). Julia, Golda's other daughter-in-law is chair of UIA Federations Canada and is on the board of directors of The Canadian Jewish News.

Henry is chair of The Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education, a CJC Ontario region committee that lobbies the government for funding for independent Jewish day schools. He is also a past president of Associated Hebrew Schools in Toronto.

Saul is the former head of the Association of Jewish Day School Parents and a former treasurer of CJC, Ontario region.

Two years ago, a chair in Jewish Teacher Education was created at York University, thanks to a donation from the Koschitzkys.

But the family's philanthropy extends beyond Canada.

The Koschitzkys contributed towards a new location for Yavneh, a school in Antwerp, Belgium, and founded Orot Yisrael, a girls' Yeshiva in Israel that also grants teachers degrees.

Despite the many causes her family supports and the many contributions they have made to the Jewish community, Golda says she and her husband always preferred anonymity.

"We wanted a low profile. We gave and we didn't need anybody to know about it," she said.

Labor Zionist Alliance marks its 90th anniversary

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the groups that worked hard for the establishment of Israel, the Labor Zionist Alliance (LZA), is celebrating its 90th anniversary Nov. 14 with a dinner at the Borochov Centre.

The Montreal branch of the LZA celebrated its 90th anniversary two years ago.

The proud history of the Toronto branch includes the founding in 1961 of Bialik Hebrew Day School, one of the only Jewish day schools in Toronto that teaches Yiddish.

The LZA also helped to set up the hachsharah farm at Smithville, Ont., in 1945, where young Zionists training to make aliyah prepared for work on kibbutzim and moshavim.

Sol Segal of Toronto, one of about 35 to 50 Canadians who trained on the hachsharah, said his time there was invaluable in preparing him for kibbutz life on Ein-Dor.

"Zionism is here now so our membership has dropped, but we continue to be actively engaged in the Jewish community," said Lou Kirshenbaum, national vice-president of the LZA. Joe Krystal is national president.

Members of the LZA were active in the founding of the Canadian Jewish Congress in the 1930s and in the more recent formation of UJA Federation of Toronto, Kirshenbaum said.

The Jewish immigrants who came to Canada in the early 1900s had various trades, but little capital; many had belonged to Zionist youth groups in Europe and they formed Poale Zion clubs in Canada to continue their work in establishing a Jewish state, Kirshenbaum said.

He noted that the members of the Poale Zion, mostly workers in the garment trade – they included furriers, milliners and leather workers – joined unions and even became union organizers and officers.

Kirshenbaum said the members of the left and the right Poale Zion merged about 25 years ago, uniting under the banner of the LZA; their headquarters are at the Borochov Centre, which is owned by the LZA and Na'amat. The building also houses Habonim/Dror, the LZA youth group, he added.

He said that in the 1920s, the LZA operated Camp Kinderland for children eight to 14 and later Camp Kvutza near Dunnville until the late 1960s.

In 1925, the Poale Zion established the Jewish Folk School, a secular afternoon school. Its students attended five days a week, after school and Sunday mornings, Kirshenbaum said.

After Bialik was established, and for a few years following, the LZA operated two schools. "Now Bialik has 800 students and is growing year by year," he said.

Reena to host conference on disabilities

TORONTO — Reena, an organization dedicated to integrating individuals with developmental disabilities into mainstream society in a Jewish environment, will celebrate its 25th anniversary with an International Conference on Developmental Disabilities in Toronto, Nov. 7 to 9.

The conference at the Sheraton Centre Hotel will explore leading-edge practices in five related areas: faith, medical, education, legal and quality of life.

Keynote speaker will be Stephen Lewis, deputy director of UNICEF and former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, who will speak Nov. 8 on People With Developmental Disabilities: A Global Perspective.

Guest speakers will be Justice Sam Filer, who lives with ALS, or Lou Gehrig's disease; his wife, Toni Silberman, a long-time human rights advocate; and Dave Hingsburger, a consultant to people with developmental disabilities.

Nearly 50 other experts will present talks, seminars and workshops on a wide variety of issues affecting the developmentally disabled, including legal rights, medical advances, public policy and sexual victimization of people with developmental disabilities.

The conference will also address the importance of faith and rituals in the everyday life of people with disabilities. Toronto Rabbi Philip Scheim will chair a session.

The session on education will feature a panel on Jewish education with Rabbi Yizchak Witty, former director of the Toronto Board of Jewish Education, and another with Dr. Aryeh Davidson of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

Other local rabbis who will address the conference are Rabbi Ron Weiss of Jewish Family & Child Service, and Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb, who will chair a session on sensitizing youth.

Suzanne Herbert, Ontario's deputy minister of education, is slated to give an overview of the province's education system; while Justice Susan Himel, a judge on Ontario's Superior Court of Justice, will address health law issues.

A panel of medical experts will explore aging and the developmentally disabled, alternative treatments, autism, and diet.

Reena was established in 1973 by parents of children with developmental disabilities as a practical alternative to institutions. The organization works to create and maintain an environment that respects and promotes dignity, individuality, independence and freedom of choice, all in a Jewish framework.

Holocaust Education week being planned for Windsor

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

WINDSOR, Ont. — A proclamation recently issued by Mayor Michael D. Hurst encouraged the community here to learn more about the Holocaust.

In declaring Nov. 2 to 9 as Holocaust Education week, Hurst said the Jewish and Christian communities should share information about the heroism of the underground fighters in the ghettos and the people interred in concentration camps.

Citizens are invited by the Windsor Jewish Community Centre to attend one or more informative programs and to visit the centre's display at the Windsor Public Library's main branch.

At the centre, the film The Last Days, which won the 1999 Oscar for best feature length documentary, will be shown Tuesday, Nov. 2 at 3.45 p.m.

At Congregation Beth El, following Shabbat services, art historian Nancy Barat will discuss and show the film The Nazi Attack on Jewish "Degenerate Art" on Nov. 5 at 8 p.m.

On Tuesday, Nov. 9 at the centre at 7 p.m., Karen Mock, national director of the League of Human Rights, B'nai Brith Canada, will speak on Victims, Perpetrators, Bystanders, and Activists – Who are They and Who are You?

איציק מאַנגער צו זיין 30סטער יאָרצייט

פון נחום סומער

עס ווערט איצט 30 יאָר זינט איציק מאַנגער איז פון אונדז אַוועק אין דער אייביקייט אין אַ נאַר־רעלאַטיוו יונגן עלטער. ער איז געווען אַ באַרימטע פיגור אין דער ייִדישער ליטעראַטור, אָבער סײַ־ווי אים געפעלט אַ ביסל מזל. ער האָט געלעבט אַ שטורמיש און באַהעמיש לעבן אַן — צו קיין גוטאי זאָל עס אים ניט זײַן — האָט ער אַ ביסל אונטערגעזונדיקט מיטן ביטערן טראָפּן, וואָס האָט זיכער באַשעדיקט זײַן געזונט.

געבענטשט זאָל זיין זיין אַנדענק!

Hamilton shul gets new rabbi

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Rabbi Mark Biller is happy to be home. Home is actually Toronto, but after seven years in the United States, Hamilton, he says, is close enough.

Rabbi Biller is the newly installed rabbi of the Conservative Beth Jacob Synagogue. On a weekday morning in his office, clad in blue jeans, shirt and tie, he is youthful and informal and has an infectious enthusiasm.

Rabbi Biller says his aim is to make Beth Jacob "a very comfortable place to be."

His style, he explains "tends to be interactive so that going to the synagogue doesn't become a spectator sport with the rabbi and cantor out there in front performing."

For years, he says, his approach has been not only "to convey the richness of Torah text and liturgy," but also "to remind people that it's fun to be Jewish."

He remembers as a youngster of 12 "being in awe" at the exciting way one of his teachers would explain Torah passages. That experience has remained with him ever since.

A graduate of an Orthodox day school, he attended the University of Toronto and spent a year in Israel at the Jerusalem Torah College. Surprisingly, he became a sports car appraiser.

At the same time, however, he was also teaching bar mitzvah students, and eventually became principal of a school with 600 pupils.

Finally, "the hobby took over," he says. He was running the Borochov Synagogue, and the Hebrew school and teaching bar mitzvah students. It was time to go back to school.

At his wife Ellen's suggestion, he enrolled in the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. The couple had just had their first baby and bought their first house. Nevertheless, they pulled up stakes and moved to New York City. Because of his Orthodox day school background, Rabbi Biller was able to complete the six-year program in five years. As a student rabbi, he spent weekends in the Catskills, officiating at services at Grossingers. And during his final two years, he officiated at High Holy Day services for the summer community on Fire Island.

Prior to his return to Canada, Rabbi Biller spent two years as rabbi of a large congregation in Montgomery, Ala., where he was impressed that 98 percent of the Jewish population was affiliated.

They were "very warm and lovely people," and he fondly recalls how they would wish one another "Shabbat Shalom, y'all."

"It was thrilling to go away, but now we're thrilled to be back," he says, especially now that the couple's 7-year-old daughter and 2-year-old son can be close to their grandparents in Toronto, Alex and Gerry Biller and Anne Sokoloff.

Importance of volunteerism recognized at Israel Bonds luncheon

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The importance of volunteerism was the theme at the recent State of Israel Bonds Women's Division luncheon honoring Rae Cohen, her daughter, Sheila Levitt, and daughter-in-law, Lorraine Cohen.

All three are dedicated Hadassah-WIZO workers who have also found time to volunteer with other Jewish organizations and in the general community.

Guest speaker, Ora Stolovitz, was especially impressed with the role volunteers of the Diaspora have played in the development and success of the State of Israel.

A sabra now resident in Montreal and herself a volunteer with a background of executive positions in Na'amat and the Canadian Zionist Federation, Stolovitz next year becomes North American vice-chair of Bonds' Women's Division, as well as Women's Division national chair for Canada.

Speaking on behalf of Bonds, Stolovitz noted that Israel's success would not have been possible without the partnership of Jews worldwide. "The partnership of Israel and the Diaspora is as vital as ever," she said.

In a warm tribute, former Hadassah-WIZO council president and 1995 Bonds honoree Beverly Lasky described this year's honorees as "three women who represent the true essence of Jewish life and exemplify, through their actions, the mitzvot of our traditions... [and who] have dedicated themselves through thick and thin to meaningful purposes and high ideals of helping to construct a better world for all people, in perfect harmony with our Jewish heritage."

Just as New York-born Rae Cohen was introduced to Hadassah-WIZO by her mother, both Sheila and Lorraine attributed their community involvement to the example set by their parents.

"My mother taught me how important it is to give something back to the community," Levitt said.

Lorraine Cohen observed that "the most wonderful feeling in the world is to be able to make a difference in the life of someone in need. I volunteer because it feels great."

Others taking part in the program included Women's Division co-chairs Sandra Fuss and Marcia Halpren; federation president Cheryl Greenbaum; Dodi Weil, outgoing national Women's Division chair; Anne Zeplowitz, wife of Temple Anshe Sholom's Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz; Sylvia Green, wife of Rabbi Morton Green of Adas Israel congregation; Elizabeth Tick; Faye Leibtag; and Elaine Katz.

About 200 guests attended the luncheon at Adas Israel Synagogue. Measured in Bonds sales, reports Hamilton Bonds office manager, Barbara Balonjan, "it was very successful."

New rabbi makes learning accessible, enjoyable

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Simchat Torah 5760 at Temple B'nai Tikvah. Under the direction of Rabbi Jamie Korngold, the adults of the congregation unscroll the Torah from beginning to end, forming a circle all the way around the room with the children sitting in the middle.

It was an experiment Rabbi Korngold was not sure would work. She had never done this before, but knew that the unscrolling of the Torah was a tradition at her parents' synagogue in New York state. The experiment did work and even exceeded expectations, making Simchat Torah an incredibly powerful experience for the whole congregation.

"The image of the adults surrounding the children with the words of the Torah, of the children being embraced by the temple community and by the Torah, was fantastic," Rabbi Korngold said.

This is but one example of the unique experiential approach to Judaism witnessed by congregants of Temple B'nai Tikvah since Rabbi Korngold joined the congregation in August.

Whether it is in children's services where she directs adults to hold the Torah upright so that the children can see the scroll, or whether it is when she simultaneously translates the Torah portion while chanting, Rabbi Korngold has a knack of making Judaism inclusive and embracing.

Born in Albany and raised in Westchester County, N.Y. Rabbi Korngold grew up in a committed Reform Jewish family. She graduated Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y., with a bachelor of science in natural resources.

Since graduating from university and before studying for the rabbinate, Rabbi Korngold, 33,

Rabbi Jamie Korngold

had a varied and eclectic career. She worked as a guide for a wilderness/leadership program, as a street musician in Japan, a taxi driver, and a sushi chef.

Her journey to the rabbinate began in Vail, Colo., where she operated a private massage therapy clinic, enjoyed great skiing, and became a lay leader of the local synagogue.

Because the Vail synagogue had no professional leadership, members of the congregation took turns leading services. It was a task Korngold enjoyed and took seriously. To prepare, she ordered books, studied, and learned what the different prayers meant. To help in her volunteer job as "acting cantor" of the congregation, she called friends in New York, who left the melodies for prayers on her answering machine.

Eventually, fellow congregants encouraged her to study for the rabbinate.

At the time, Korngold was looking for a career change – she felt that she needed to use her intellect more and to reach more people. "It felt right to me," she said.

Rabbi Korngold then enrolled in the five-year rabbinic studies program at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Her position at Temple B'nai Tikvah is her first job as a rabbi, but during her five years of study she worked as a student rabbi in Vail, Chicago, and Atlanta.

Once she had completed her studies, Rabbi Korngold was interviewed by 17 congregations.

She chose Calgary for her first full-time rabbinical position for several reasons. The first was the ruach (spirit) she witnessed at Friday night services at Temple B'nai Tikvah.

"I really liked the way the congregation prayed and I didn't see that [ruach] anywhere else. These are the kind of services I lead – it was a good fit."

She was also impressed with the enthusiasm of the congregation for learning and experimenting. And the third motivating factor was Calgary's proximity to the mountains, which will allow her to live the lifestyle she enjoys as an avid skier and marathon runner.

Her love of nature and appreciation for the opportunities wilderness experiences afford for connecting with God is something Rabbi Korngold hopes to share with her congregants – particularly with the young people.

"I enjoy working with kids. It's challenging, but I like the honesty in them," she said. "I know how important it was to me to have older role models, people who were cool, who wouldn't let me off, but would be honest and frank with me. This role gives me the ability to be that [role model] for kids."

Other than initiating changes in youth programming, Rabbi Korngold has no plans for major changes at the temple. She plans to spend her first year observing and creating opportunities that make learning accessible and enjoyable.

One of only six women rabbis in Canada (two of whom are in Alberta), Rabbi Korngold looks forward to working with Rabbi Seth Binus of Congregation House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel and Rabbi Moshe Saks of the Beth Tzedec Congregation as part of the Calgary Jewish community's rabbinical council.

No major changes planned at temple

She reports that she has already spoken to the other two rabbis on some issues, and these discussions have gone smoothly.

As for her relationship with her congregation, Rabbi Korngold says that it is not her style to be a forceful leader. Rather, she describes her leadership style as "empowering and inclusive."

Her intention is to make the temple "more congregation-centred rather than rabbi-centred."

There are many things that can be done without involving the rabbi in a primary role, Rabbi Korngold said, citing havdalah services as an example of experiences that can happen in people's homes without the presence of a rabbi.

Rabbi Korngold sees her role as "empowering people to be leaders, guiding them to reclaim their Judaism."

Rabbi Korngold joins Temple B'nai Tikvah at a time when the congregation is preparing to take a major step forward – that is, the building of a synagogue building on the land adjacent to the Calgary Jewish Centre.

The congregation's offices are now housed in two separate areas of the Jewish centre, and regular services are held there. High Holy Day services are held in a rented location downtown.

While Rabbi Korngold is enjoying the experience of interfacing with other parts of the community, she recognizes the disadvantages of being housed in the centre. "We need to have appropriate space for appropriate activities."

Furthermore, Rabbi Korngold believes that it is important for the temple to have a home, a gathering place, and a centre for its activities.

"I have the image of Deborah and her tree. Why did she sit under a tree? Because it was important that she was in a specific place if people needed her judging," Rabbi Korngold said, adding: "Lovely as it is to share space, it would be nice to have a Reform Jewish space."

JCS arts festival to receive award

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

Tamar Kagan, director of Coloring Ourselves with Susan Posner and Yoni Stanleigh, two of the organizers of the program.

TORONTO —The efforts of a group of students who spent four months helping the Toronto Jewish Campus Services (JCS) organize an arts festival have really paid off.

Coloring Ourselves: A Festival of Jewish Student Creativity has netted JCS, an umbrella organization encompassing Jewish campus groups in Toronto, an international award.

On Dec. 22, JCS will receive the Elie Wiesel Award, given by Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life. This is the first time a Canadian organization has won the award which honors originality and innovation in campus arts and culture programming.

Named after the famous writer and Nobel Peace Prize winner, the annual award, inaugurated in 1990, is open to any Hillel-affiliated campus organization.

Coloring Ourselves, which was held at the Poor Alex Theatre on Brunswick Avenue last March, was the second annual arts festival organized by JCS. The three-day event showcased the photographs, sculptures, music, and other creative works of more than 100 Jewish students from Toronto universities and colleges.

"It captured the creative spirit and vision of so many students and I'm incredibly proud of it," said Tamar Kagan, arts and culture co-ordinator for JCS.

Many of the festival's contributors were not previously active in Jewish campus activities, she noted.

"It was a lot of new faces Jewish Campus Services hadn't met before which was exciting."

The JCS's first Jewish student arts festival was organized by Sidura Ludwig, founding editor of Dorot, a journal of contemporary Jewish literature written by students.

"What she [Ludwig] did exposed real interest in creative work and the connection between someone's identity as an artist and their identity as a Jew," said Kagan.

Coloring Ourselves was so exceptional the committee which branded the program a winner will not be giving an honorable mention for the first time in Hillel's history, said Steven Schauder, director of the department of Jewish student life at Hillel International Centre in Washington, D.C.

"They [committee members] wanted to provide full recognition to this program," he said.

Kagan puts focus on Jewish art

By ERIC STEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Tamar Kagan, arts and culture co-ordinator for Jewish Campus Services (JCS), is passionate about motivating students to create Jewish-themed art.

The organizer of last year's Jewish student arts festival, Coloring Ourselves, Kagan said she hopes to foster the creation of Jewish-themed art through a series of fall workshops that are being co-sponsored by the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

"We want to encourage people who are exploring their artistic expression in more general ways to explore that expression in a Jewish context.

"The workshops provide hands-on opportunities and a friendly environment for young artists to discover inspiration in the Jewish arts."

Kagan said she hopes the students taking these workshops will submit Jewish-themed art to the up-coming arts festival which will run next year from March 5 to 8.

She stressed that it is not necessary to have a background in Jewish artistic forms or a certain level of religiosity to participate in the workshops.

"We hope people of all backgrounds will come to discover something personal in these workshops. There are no restrictions. Open-mindedness is all that is required," she said.

The following is a selection of the workshops offered:

Scribblers is a forum for creative writing. Local poet, performer and psychotherapist Ronna Bloom will host these sessions held on consecutive Monday evenings until Nov. 8.

Actress, writer and folklorist Leslie Robbins will host a storytelling session Nov. 7, 2 to 6 p.m. Participants will explore the history and sources of of Jewish storytelling, and will learn about presenting Jewish stories orally.

Writer, actor, comedian and renowned Yiddishist Michael Wex will host the final workshop, a session devoted to Yiddish theatre, on Nov. 21.

The fee of $20 covers most of the workshops except Scribblers, which will cost $30.

Kagan is also planning a one-day January retreat to explore the theme of beginnings using Jewish texts. Participants will then apply this study to creative expressions in theatre, visual arts, and creative writing.

The arts festival submission deadline is Jan. 14. For more information about the workshops, festival or retreat, call 878-9658.

Israel a step closer to ending UN isolation

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

UNITED NATIONS — France has opened the way for Israel's full participation at the United Nations by withdrawing its objection to Israel joining the European regional bloc at the world body.

Now only a handful of European states remain opposed to Israel's membership in the group, a prerequisite for joining important UN committees and the Security Council.

Israel's outgoing UN ambassador, Dore Gold, said the issue could be resolved in a matter of weeks. This would end Israel's isolation as the only country to be denied membership in such a group.

"We are on the verge of a major breakthrough in the normalization of Israel" at the UN, the ambassador said at a luncheon in his honor in New York sponsored by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

France had previously been a chief opponent of the move, a role now held by only Ireland and countries in the southern tier of Europe.

Observers say competition is a key reason for the opposition to Israel's membership in the Western Europe and Others Group. Increased membership in a regional group reduces the chances for each individual member-state to be appointed to important posts.

Admission in a regional group requires consensus on the part of its standing membership: Not all members must approve the admission, but none can object.

Of the five regional groups at the United Nations, Israel geographically belongs to the Asian bloc, but members of that group – Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia and others – have consistently blocked Israel's entry.

Gold, who leaves his post Oct. 28 after more than two years, said that at this time last year there was no feeling that a consensus could be reached among the European group's members, which include the United States, Australia, Canada and Norway.

He credited the change, to the work of U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and Richard Holbrooke, the American ambassador to the United Nations, who made Israel's inclusion in a regional bloc a diplomatic priority. Gold also commended the work of American Jewish groups who lobbied their international contacts on the issue.

Last month, Albright related to Jewish leaders in New York that when she met with world leaders at the opening of the UN General Assembly, she took along a copy of the American Jewish Committee's full-page advertisement in the New York Times.

Resolution condemns terrorism

The ad starkly shows that Israel alone is ineligible to sit on the UN Security Council, while nations cited by the U.S. State Department for terrorism – including Iraq, North Korea and Syria – are eligible as members of regional groups.

In another turn around at the United Nations, the Security Council unanimously passed a resolution unequivocally condemning what has become a global scourge.

The resolution, initiated by the Russian Federation, condemns unequivocally "all acts, methods and practices of terrorism as criminal and unjustifiable regardless of their motivation."

Although it does not mention any nation by name, Gold said the resolution represents a "180-degree shift" in international consensus on terrorism and "creates the groundwork" for international action against "states that support terrorism, many of which are adversaries of Israel."

The resolution draws upon a 1994 declaration against terrorism by the General Assembly, but represents the first strong statement by the Security Council.

In passing the resolution Oct. 19, the 15-member body called on all United Nations member-states to fully implement and adhere to international anti-terrorist conventions, to co-operate on a bilateral and multilateral basis in fighting terrorism and "to deny safe havens for those who planned, financed or committed terrorist acts by ensuring their apprehension and prosecution or extradition."

Gold said that the wording so closely adheres to Israel's stance on the issue that "it could have been written in Jerusalem."

Barak stands up for the Netanyahus over allegations

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak indirectly criticized the police recently and defended the man he defeated in a hard-fought national election five months ago, saying former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife – facing allegations of pilfering state gifts after Netanyahu left office – must be considered innocent unless proven guilty.

"In a properly run state, every man is considered innocent until proven otherwise. Suspects have rights and are accorded dignity, and these rights are also binding on the police," Barak said during the weekly cabinet meeting.

There has been widespread speculation that police were responsible for tipping off the media before investigators conducted a search of the Netanyahus' home last Wednesday and confiscated boxes presumed to be filled with gifts given to the state. The confiscation was conducted in the full glare of television cameras.

The media have also been tipped off each time the Netanyahus have been summoned by police.

Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein recently ordered the police to conduct an internal investigation to determine whether police are the source of leaks. He ordered the investigation after State Attorney Edna Arbel severely criticized the media leaks.

Police Chief Yehuda Wilk denied that police were the likely source of leaks in an interview on Channel One.

He said that when he learned that the media had been tipped off that Benjamin Netanyahu was about to be questioned for the first time at the police's national fraud division headquarters in Bat Yam, he notified the former prime minister's lawyer and offered to change the venue of the meeting, but the lawyer declined.

Sara Netanyahu was to be questioned for a third time by police in Bat Yam. She was to face questions over services she and her husband received from contractor Avner Amedi, who submitted a bill for NIS 400,000 to the Prime Minister's Office after Netanyahu left office. Amedi has since turned state's witness.

Barak has learned to adapt to changing realities

By AKIVA ELDAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Nearly 20 years passed between the time when Jimmy Carter suggested that Yitzhak Rabin talk with the PLO and the day Rabin shook Yasser Arafat's hand.

Analysis

Now, four years after the handshake that cost Rabin his life, and 100 days after Ehud Barak entered the Prime Minister's Office, there are signs that Barak is fast learning how to adapt his positions to the changing reality.

Barak has already learned the most important lesson: he will rise or fall on the strength of the peace agreements.

There is a remarkable similarity between the circumstances in which the two men began their tenures.

Rabin promised a breakthrough in the peace process "within six to nine months."

When the time came, he was hindered by a rickety coalition, a foreign minister breathing down his neck and strikes throughout the economy. He was at a dead end with the Palestinians and was not seeing eye to eye with the United States over the lines of withdrawal from the Golan. Caught in his own predicament, Rabin understood that Arafat's plight presented him with an avenue of escape and his biggest opportunity to achieve peace.

Barak has started out surrounded by rankled, grumpy ministers, with a coalition comprising the same odd combination of Shas and Meretz, with a huge hole in the budget, with strikes and unemployment.

The IDF is stuck in Lebanon and the talks with Syria are stuck at the point where Rabin left them. Talks with the Palestinians on the interim agreements have also not shown promise. Purposely or not, Barak has done the same as Rabin and allotted peace a nine-month gestation period.

Barak believes that cards held close to the chest are that much further from the adversary's pocket. His ministers have therefore been warned not to speak of a Palestinian state. It doesn't mean Barak opposes the idea. He thinks that as long as this card is not laid on the table, more can be obtained in return for it. Behind the scenes, in direct and indirect talks with Palestinian leaders (another meeting with Arafat is expected in two weeks), everyone knows just why the bride and groom are heading to the altar.

The Palestinians were impressed that Barak knows the Yossi Beilin-Abu Mazen accord by heart. The prime minister has basically adopted this document's proposal on the refugee problem, namely, that the Palestinian state will decide how many refugees to absorb.

In return for the Palestinians dropping their demand for the "right of return," the accord says, Israel will allocate agreed-upon funding to reunite families. The international community will set up a fund to help returning Palestinians and to compensate them for property left in Israel.

It seems that on Jerusalem, Barak is no longer fearful of formulas such as the one that would make Abu Dis the Palestinian capital near Jerusalem and would free Israel from control of most of the city's Palestinian residents.

For Barak, the main thing is security. At present, he is not content with the ideas in the Beilin-Abu Mazen document (demilitarization, hilltop warning stations and a buffer force along the Jordan). The lands he wants to annex to the settlement blocs are 10 to 30 percent larger than the Palestinians' declared ceiling; they talk about getting 95 percent of the land, and the widespread notion is that they will compromise on 85 percent. Barak's blocs leave them with 65 percent, and the guess is that he will compromise on 75 percent.

On the Syrian channel, Barak is not ready to step into Rabin's shoes. But people who have seen the minutes of the talks between Ron Lauder and Hafez al-Assad say that when the day finally comes, you'll need a microscope to see the differences between Barak's deal with Syria and the map Netanyahu's emissary sketched in Damascus.

Ehud Barak

Either way, Barak was confident last week that he could keep to the ambitious timetable he has set, and by next year, present a framework accord for peace that would strengthen Israel's security and add more than two Israeli embassies to Arab capitals.

Moreover, he has no doubt that the public will approve all the peace deals in a referendum – by an even more sweeping majority than the majority that elected him prime minister.

Algerian president calls for Mideast co-existence

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — Algerian President Abdelaziz Bouteflika called for peace and reconciliation in the Middle East in an interview that is to appear in the upcoming November-December issue of the U.S. publication, Middle East Insight.

"The time has come to give peace the chance it deserves, in order to allow the new generations of both nations (Arab and Israeli) to live the next century in fraternity and to dress the open wounds inflicted during the last century," he told the magazine.

He said that his meeting with Ehud Barak at the funeral of King Hassan II of Morocco was unplanned but was in keeping with Algerian policy.

"My country's position toward Israel is based on the principle of defending just causes," the president said. "We have never shared the doctrine which called for the Israelis to be 'thrown into the sea' nor have we shared the doctrine of the 'Greater Israel' which would include land belonging to its neighbors.

"We are for fraternal co-existence among the peoples of the region in the framework of internationally recognized borders, the territorial integrity of states – that is to say the return by Israel of territories unduly occupied in 1967 – and the recognition of the right of Palestinians to establish a state with Jerusalem as its capital.

"This is in fact what I told Barak, David Levy and Shimon Peres in Rabat. I also told them that Algeria would have stood on the side of the Israelis if they had been in the same situation as the Palestinians."

Bouteflika said Algerians accepted his discussions with Barak as "very normal." He added that he expects Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights and southern Lebanon and to recognize the legitimate rights of the Palestinians.

"Only under these conditions can a new page be written in the Middle East characterized by peace, stability, shared security, fruitful co-operation and equitably shared prosperity."

The Week in Israel

Oct. 18

• The military industry was given permission to sell light arms to Jordan for the first time. Israeli arms have previously reached Arab states through a third party.

Oct. 19

• Ethiopian activists launched a campaign to raise public awareness of the plight of what they say are 18,000 Ethiopians hoping to immigrate to Israel.

Oct. 20

• Israeli media reported Jordan's press organization expelled three of its members for defying a ban on travelling to Israel. The three had visited Israel at the invitation of Haifa University.

• Police questioned former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sarah about valuables that were seized during a search of the Netanyahus' home. (The Netanyahus were called back for more questioning Thursday.)

• Egypt is undermining Israeli attempts to improve relations with Arab countries, Foreign Minister David Levy told Israel Radio. "Egypt has double vision. On the one hand, the peace with Israel is important; on the other hand, they try to block every attempt by Israel to improve its relations and co-operation with Arab countries."

Oct. 21

• Despite protests from some of their colleagues, Yesha leaders completed the dismantling of five unpopulated outposts in the West Bank, as agreed with Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

• At least 16 Palestinians were killed and 30 injured in a fire at a chemicals factory in the Palestinian-controlled part of Hebron. Most of the dead were female workers who were trapped inside when the fire broke out. Israeli fire crews were called in to help the Palestinian firefighters.

Oct. 22

• The media reported that the military ruler who seized control of Pakistan, General Pervey Musharraf, told Israel he will not change his country's policy toward Israel.

Europe leads efforts to free Iranian Jews

By JULIA GOLDMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Efforts continue to mobilize international support for the 13 Iranian Jews arrested in March for spying for Israel, advocates in the United States say.

European officials have recently been at the forefront, advancing the issue with the Iranian government, which has said it will try the Jews in a revolutionary court in the southern city of Shiraz.

On Oct. 14, Iran's Foreign Ministry reportedly said it was "surprised" that France would raise the issue of the 13 Jews – whose number is believed to include Jewish religious and communal leaders – during a visit by President Mohammad Khatami scheduled for late October.

Iran says that several Muslims are being held along with the Jews, as an indication that the arrests were not motivated by religion or ethnicity.

Iran is considered by observers to be locked in a struggle between moderates under Khatami, and religious hardliners, even as it attempts to strengthen its ties to the West.

"The case of the Jews is an internal Iranian matter and is the proper business of Iran's courts," a Foreign Ministry spokesman was quoted as saying in the Tehran press.

The day before, French Foreign Minister Hubert Vedrine declared that he and Prime Minister Lionel Jospin would broach the subject with Khatami, who will be the first Iranian president to visit France since the 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran.

Last month, Austrian President Thomas Klestil raised the case with Iran's spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, during what was the first visit to Iran by a European head of state since 1979.

Khamenei reportedly told Klestil that the issue was an internal matter and that "if their crime is proved by the court, they will probably be punished."

Espionage is punishable by death in Iran, and 17 Jews have been executed for spying in the past 20 years.

Last month, however, U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, in a meeting with Jewish leaders in New York, reiterated reports that Tehran had given assurances that "in time of peace, Iran does not apply capital punishment."

As diplomatic advocacy continues to try to free the 13 Jews – or at least secure an expeditious, fair and open trial – Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, is stressing that there is no need for funds on behalf of the Jews being held or the Jewish community in Iran.

The Presidents Conference, a New York-based umbrella group, has been active on the issue since word of the Jews' imprisonment in the city of Shiraz emerged in April.

Reports of fundraising activity for the Iranian Jews prompted Hoenlein to warn that any such solicitation "should be considered a sham."

Hoenlein also said such fundraising could endanger the Jewish community in Iran because it "sets up a situation where all Iranian Jews would become potential hostages."

Israelis still grappling with legacy of murder

Four years ago, in the weeks preceding the slaying, settlers launched large-scale protests across Israel against turning over any West Bank territory to the Palestinians.

Yigal Amir, who was very involved in those protests, shot Rabin on Nov. 4, 1995, and later said his actions were justified by Jewish law.

Last week, echoing the acrimony that preceded the slaying, Orthodox rabbis prohibited the dismantling of West Bank settlements.

Israel's attorney general stressed that while freedom of expression must be upheld, law enforcement officials must ensure it does not slide into political violence.

The renewed momentum in Israeli-Palestinian peace moves, and the concessions it is expected to bring, have sharpened the political debate.

At the same time, religious-secular tensions have also intensified.

Organizers of the dialogue tent hoped the encounters would help the different groups bridge their differences.

Such dialogue "helps create a public atmosphere that could prevent the next political murder," Danny Tropper, chair of the Gesher – Hebrew for "bridge" – Foundation, told Ma'ariv.

On Nov. 4, the date of the assassination on the secular calendar, a memorial integrating some of the graffiti art put up at the site of the assassination is to be unveiled.

A week later, on Nov. 11, U.S. first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton is due to speak in Tel Aviv as the guest of the Rabin Centre for Israel Studies.

Gallery dedicated to memory of Nathan Shiff

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — The recent opening of Now and Then, an exhibition of sculpture and paintings by Karen Reiss at the Nathan Shiff Gallery, was very much a family affair.

The B.C. artist's bold ceramic sculptures and multimedia painting – she describes her work as figurative expressionistic – were shown with work by her husband, poet Murray Reiss. His poetry, which was framed and mounted, was also on display.

Murray, the cousin of the late Nathan Shiff for whom the gallery is named, gave a poetry reading. Shiff's nephew, Matthew Roy, a guitarist, also performed.

The show opened on a day officially dedicated to mental illness awareness. But gallery owner Verna Shiff, Nathan's wife, said the timing was purely coincidental.

Launched in May, the Nathan Shiff Gallery (1252 Danforth Ave.) features the work of artists suffering from mental illness, as well as work by mainstream artists who do not have psychological problems, Verna Shiff said.

"The idea is to give them [artists with mental illness] an opportunity to exhibit their work without making the illness the focus. There are lots of group art shows for people with long term illness. I find that degrading. I wanted to get away from the stigma. I want to bring the art to a higher level."

She stressed that the quality of the works of art is what is important. "I want this to be a gallery that stands on the work. The illness should be the secondary point."

The gallery is a tribute to her late husband, an artist who was diagnosed with schizophrenia in his late teens. He died of emphysema in January at the age of 53.

Last Exhibit

Shiff said that while her husband struggled with mental illness and had many admissions to hospital, he always painted.

"He did primarily acrylic on canvas. He was rarely without a paint brush or pencil. He was always drawing or writing."

"When he got sick in the last two years of his life, he moved to water colors. He was drawing up until the last day with a ball point pen."

During the last months of his life, she said, he asked her to display his work after he died. "He wanted one last art exhibition."

Exhibiting her husband's works in her home was not an option, and following his death, she was not up to making the rounds of the established galleries, she said.

In May she found a storefront on the Danforth and rented the space for a month for a private exhibition of her husband's work.

She said when she was hanging the artwork with Nathan's sister Lucy Roy, who is also an artist, she decided to keep the gallery going.

Shiff said the exhibition of her husband's work was not planned as a commercial venture.

"When I did the exhibition, I didn't think I'd sell anything. I wanted to show, not sell, Nathan's work. I wanted people to see what he did. I wanted to sell a catalogue [of his work] to raise money for mental health."

But "I've sold a lot of his work. It amazes me. I made $4,050 after two weeks. I couldn't believe it."

While the proceeds from the initial exhibition were donated, Shiff said, the success of that first exhibition spurred her on, and she's become part of the local business community on the Danforth.

"In April, I'll be showing the work of the Danforth Tech graduating art school. And one of the teachers is going to take part in the next group exhibit."

The show in which the teacher is participating opens Nov. 11. at 6:30 p.m. It will include works by Lucy Roy, Ann Hardiman, Kevin Turner and Peter Howlett.

A collection of Nathan Shiff's works are on permanent display at the gallery. For more information, call 463-8957.

Playwright seeks to create 'new community'

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jack Messinger, who grew up in Toronto, but has recently returned here after 15 years directing plays in Israel, is on a mission.

He wants to create a new Jewish theatre that will introduce the community he knew here to the "new community," which includes immigrants from Israel and other countries of the Middle East, Europe and Russia.

To this end he has established Theatre is Real, which offers acting classes in Hebrew and English.

Familiar with Israeli theatre, Messinger is confident that he can bridge the gap between plays that are popular in the Diaspora and those that attract Israelis.

He has directed four plays currently running in repertory in Tel Aviv, Missing Kissinger, Three Tall Women, My Ex-Eternal Wife and Downtown.

He wants to stage plays here by Israeli playwrights Hanoch Levin, Hillel Mitttlepunci, Danny Horowitz, Yehoshua Sobol and Motti Lerner in Hebrew and English.

He said he is just as comfortable directing in Hebrew as in English, but when he first arrived in Israel, it took him awhile to get the hang of giving lines in Hebrew to his actors.

To increase the interest of young people in Hebrew theatre, Messinger is giving a workshop Nov. 8 for the Board of Jewish Education on teaching Hebrew through drama and storytelling through drama.

"The community has changed so much, and is so much larger, that I want to use theatre as a way of bringing diverse groups together," he said.

A graduate of Forest Hill Collegiate, Messinger has a BA in English from the University of Toronto and a master's degree in fine arts from Yale University. He had leading acting roles at theatres in Canada, including at the Stratford and Shaw festivals, before going to Israel.

In Israel, he met his wife, Marra, a native of Winnipeg, who was then a cultural officer with the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv. Later, she became circulation director of the Jerusalem Post. In Toronto, she has become executive director of the Fund Against Poverty in Children.

Jack Messinger

Their 8-year-old daughter, Atari, attends Associated Hebrew School in Thornhill. "Her chief problem is adjusting to how Hebrew is spoken here," he laughed.

The son of Lillian Messinger, a Toronto social worker, he has a brother, Stephen, a partner in the law firm of Goodman and Carr, and a sister, Fran, who runs a talent agency.

Four artists picked as finalists for Saidye Bronfman Award

TORONTO — Canadian artists Roseline Delisle, Susan Low-Beer, Les Manning, Michael D. Massie and Mariette Rousseau-Vermette have been named as finalists for this year's $20,000 Saiyde Bronfman Award.

Now in its 23rd year, the Saidye Bronfman Award was established by the Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Family Foundation to honor the 80th birthday of Saidye Bronfman, a longtime supporter of the arts, and to provide leadership in recognizing and honoring the high levels of excellence achieved by Canadian craft artists.

This year's announcement, the first time the finalists for the award have been named, was made recently by the Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Family Foundation, in association with the Canada Council for the Arts and the Canadian Museum of Civilization, partners in the award.

A signature exhibition of recent work by the five finalists will be on display at the 25th annual One of a Kind Canadian Craft Show and Sale at the National Trade Centre in Toronto, Nov. 25 to Dec. 5.

The peer assessment committee that adjudicates the award considers all aspects of esthetics, including creativity, innovation and technical mastery, as well as the nominees' contribution to the development of the fine crafts in Canada over a significant period of time. The nomination and adjudication processes are administered by the Canada Council for the Arts.

The Saidye Bronfman Award recipient will be announced at a special ceremony at the craft show and sale, on Nov. 25.

The five finalists for this year's Bronfman Award are:

Roseline Delisle, a ceramist who has expanded her crafting of porcelain vessels to the level of sculpture. She has exhibited worldwide in England, Czechoslovakia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Japan, Norway, Poland, Russia, Switzerland, Turkey and the United States.

Susan Low-Beer, a Toronto-based ceramist who bridges traditional craft practice with contemporary sculpture. A sculptor in clay, Low-Beer's figurative work has been embraced by both the craft and fine art worlds. She has exhibited in solo and group shows across Canada and in Czechoslovakia, Japan, Mexico and the United States.

Les Manning, a familiar figure in the Canadian and international ceramic community. Over a 25 year period, he developed the ceramics studio program at the Banff Centre from a summer school to an internationally respected artists' residency program. His unique low-fired functional ceramic work often incorporates his personal view of landscape and demonstrates technical mastery. Manning, who has exhibited widely both nationally and internationally, is now based in Elginburg, Ont.

Michael D. Massie, a silversmith well known in Canada and abroad. A graduate of the Nova Scotia College of Art and Design, Massie now teaches in Stephenville, Nfld.

CANADIAN MUSICIANS HELP OUT IN TAIWAN

Margot Rydall and Ivan Zilman, the Toronto-based flautist and guitarist of the musical ensemble Duo, were on a concert tour of Taiwan when a large earthquake struck the island on Sept. 21.

In the following turmoil, telephone and fax lines were disrupted, but Rydall and Zilman were able to set up a benefit performance in Taipei, where they had been staying in a building that sustained substantial damage.

All money raised was donated to the Taiwan Earthquake Relief Fund.

They also donated some of their CDs to raise funds for the relief effort with the help of the Canadian Trade Office in Taipei.

While most other foreign musicians left the country immediately after the quake, Duo stayed. Their concerts in Taichung and Koshsiung were cancelled, but a gala recital in the National Concert Hall in Taipei proceeded as scheduled.

On their return home to Toronto, the band staged a benefit recital at the Beach Interfaith Drop-in Centre for victims of the quake, the worst to hit Taiwan this century.

In the Spotlight: Does the name Sidney M. Cohen sound familiar? He's the Thornhill-based producer of The Mad Dash, a popular television game show that ran on the CTV network from 1978 to 1985.

The show featured a multi-colored game board on which contestants raced to the finish line, competing for big prizes such as cars, trips, appliances, furniture, luxury items and cash.

A new version of the show has become highly popular in Poland. Duety do Mety, which translates as "Two People to the Finish Line," is possibly the first English-Canadian television series to be made abroad. Since 1998, the program has been produced in the Polish city of Lodz. Other countries have recently optioned rights or are considering producing their own versions.

Cohen, a former head of news programming for CTV, is a regular visitor to the set in Poland. He is preparing a documentary on the making of the Polish series.

Quartet at Leah Posluns

The Vilnius String Quartet will be performing at the Leah Posluns Theatre in Toronto on Nov.1 at 8 p.m.

The program will feature Five Pieces for String Quartet composed by Ervin Schulhoff; Jan Radzynski's Three Hebrew Melodies and Moise Vainberg's Quintet for Piano, Two Violins, Viola and Violoncello, Op.18.

The concert is a reprise of the historic concert given by the quartet for the opening of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington in 1997.

The quartet features pianist Golda Wainberg-Taitz who received her training in Lithuania, Israel and the United States. She has received numerous prizes including the Prix du Disque from the French Institute in Paris in 1994.

New theatre program explores Torah text

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — The Bloor JCC is the site of a new program that will combine Torah study with the creative arts.

Moon in June Productions is presenting Mythic Theatre, a "spiritual renewal through the performing arts," facilitated by Dorothy Lichtblau.

The program will examine the Torah text of Abraham and Sarah and then look at related texts such as poetry and writings; finally, after a series of writing and acting exercises, a dramatic rendition of the story will be performed.

After studying the texts, "we look at the gap between the black lines. Imagine who else was there, what the place looked like and what else was going on for the people in these stories," Lichtblau said. "We then create a new midrash and shape it into a performance piece."

Lichtblau said the program is extremely stimulating and allows participants to examine themselves.

"These stories deal with questions and issues that are timeless and give us insight into ourselves and the world around us."

The program will suit people who are interested in exploring biblical literature and "want to have an arena in which they can learn acting and writing techniques and free up the imagination."

Mythic Theatre runs for eight weeks every Tuesday at the Bloor JCC from 7 to 10 pm. Cost is $220 for non-members and $180 for members. Call 922-4934.

Russian immigrant is sincere about making music

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It may be a touch ironic but Soviet anti-Semitism may be partially responsible for launching Alla Kadysh's musical career.

Kadysh graduated with a degree in engineering in Moscow, but being Jewish made it tough for her to land a desirable job in that field, she said in a recent interview.

"After graduating you're supposed to be placed in a job" and in the former Soviet Union (FSU) the higher one's marks, the better choice of jobs, she explained.

"I was right up there and wanted to work in a research laboratory, but when they looked at my papers and saw I was Jewish – there was no way. I couldn't get my foot in the door."

Well the science industry's loss is a music lover's gain. Kadysh said she decided then to turn to her first love – music. She hooked up with a Jewish theatre group and started performing in Hebrew and Yiddish. She hasn't looked back.

Now living in Toronto, the 34-year-old mother of three has recently released a collection of 11 original songs in English called Perichole's Sincerity Theory.

The album's first song Woman From the Wrong Century is a perfect example of Kadysh's beautiful, high-pitched voice which bares resemblance to British pop artist Kate Bush and popular Canadian singer Loreena McKennitt.

The album is very versatile. From contemporary pop, slow piano to world music, jazz and folk, Kadysh blends beautiful melody with her Russian-accented sultry voice.

Although all the songs are good, she's the first to admit her versatility is causing her marketing problems. Because she doesn't fit an obvious niche, record companies are reluctant to sign her, she said.

"Although some record labels showed interest, their main complaint was that I was all over the place. They say, 'I love your voice but you're hard to place in a specific category.'"

Kadysh said the songs she's currently working on are more focussed and probably fit into the broad "world beat" category. But that's not something she planned, it's just the direction her musical tastes are taking her, she said.

"I'm not going to change my style just to fit into a proper category."

Kadysh immigrated to Canada in 1992. It's taken her a long time to get back into music because starting a new way of life, learning a new language and raising kids can be quite taxing.

Recording Perichole's Sincerity Theory also was quite distressing.

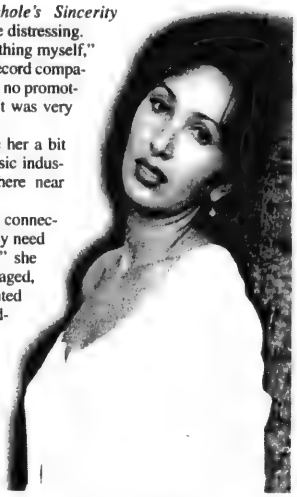
"I had to do everything myself," she said. "I have no record company, no booking agent, no promoter and no producer. It was very difficult."

All this had made her a bit cynical about the music industry, but she is nowhere near giving up.

"I don't have any connections and you certainly need that in this business," she said. "I'm not discouraged, just a little disappointed with the close-mindedness of the record labels."

Kadysh has little fondness for her native Russia. She remembers what it was like to be Jewish in the FSU.

For example, she recalled having a girlfriend who wasn't Jewish, but whose name was "suspicious;" the two used to go to synagogue for social reasons.



Alla Kadysh

"It was a great place to go dancing on Simchat Torah and meet guys. One guy from the Communist Youth League saw her going into the synagogue and that was the end of her job placement."

In Pioneer Camp she used to derisively be called a Jew by the other girls. "I used to fight a lot when I was young," she said with a laugh.

Thus she has no desire to return to Russia and is enjoying her new- found freedom in Canada.

Besides raising her children, she is continuing to manage her music career all by herself until that coveted record label deal comes through.

She performs often at cafes and bookstores and her album is available in major stores.

"I like performing and seeing people reacting in a certain way – it's surprisingly been a very good reaction."

Gentiles celebrate Yiddish

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Russian tenor Igor Bouts may not be Jewish, but he was the big hit of the sold-out annual variety show at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), which celebrated the year of Yiddish culture.

Eight of the nine performers in the show were not Jewish.

When Bouts sang and danced Quando, Quando, he had the majority of the audience of 450 keeping time to the music, and cheering when he danced with a woman in the front row.

His jazzed up treatment of Romania, Romania, was well received, too, as were his renditions of Beltz, Cheribim Bom Bom and the Last Waltz. The greatest ovations came when he danced around the stage to the music.

Violinist Michale Zizkind, the only Jewish performer of the evening, entertained with well- known Yiddish and Hebrew songs.

Hewing to the Yiddish theme were the six Russian dancers – Evalina Galina, Galina Shapovalova, Tatiana Shurkina, Alexei Fateyev, Aivor Shurkin and Sergei Orekhovitch.

Fateyev was the artistic director and Galina the choreographer.

Teme Kernerman headed the arrangements for the concert, while Joe Starr was the concert chair.

A special tribute in Yiddish was given by Ed Yuditsky, while Ida Gross, president of the Fifty-five Plus Club at the BJC, also welcomed the guests.

A.M. Klein's classic novel about to be reissued

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — This month the University of Toronto Press is set to bring out a new definitive edition of one of the most important and influential works of Canadian Jewish literature – A. M. Klein's poetic novel The Second Scroll.

One of Canada's largest scholarly publishers, the U of T Press is offering the edition as the seventh in a series of eight volumes of works by the legendary Montreal poet, essayist and novelist, who died in 1972.

Guided by a cross-country academic committee that first convened in 1974, the Klein-focused publishing endeavor is "the most ambitious literary project of its kind in Canada," according to series co-editor Zailig Pollock, a professor of literature at Trent University in Peterborough, Ont.

The Second Scroll has been recognized as one of the earliest examples of Holocaust literature since its initial publication by Alfred A. Knopf Inc. in 1951.

The Canadian literary critic Northrup Frye called the book "one of the most passionate and intense of all Canadian novels" and it is commonly considered the greatest novel of Jewish reawakening written in Canada.

In form it resembles the Pentateuch, with five main books and a patchwork of canonical appendages. Its story, which stretches from the Russian pogroms of 1917 to the emergence of the modern state of Israel, is presented as a rough metaphorical equivalent to the biblical saga that culminates with the children of Israel reaching the Promised Land.

Although often cited by Canadian Jewish writers as a major influence, Klein, who was born in Ukraine in 1909 and arrived in Montreal soon after, never achieved the level of popular fame of some Montreal Jewish writers who rose in his shadow, such as Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen and Mordecai Richler.

As co-editor Elizabeth Popham notes in her highly trenchant introduction, Klein's only published novel is recognized "as one of the first examples of 'Holocaust literature,' the forerunner of works by Wiesel, Bellow, and Roth."

Norman Ravvin, a Canadian writer and specialist in Holocaust fiction, agrees that The Second Scroll is "an early breakthrough treatment" of the Holocaust in North American literature.

"He's writing about the fallout for Jews and the Holocaust long before other writers are willing to try it," says Ravvin. "He takes a religious tack, connecting the catastrophe with a declaration of the State of Israel, so there's a kind of triumphant completion to the awful events of the war."

The Second Scroll tells the story of a Montreal journalist who, after the war, wanders to Rome, Morocco and Israel in search of his uncle, a Holocaust survivor whose own peregrinations through secularism, existentialism, Bolshevism, renewed Judaism and Zionism seem archetypical of the Jewish people. Deeply intellectual and poetic, the work is best regarded as an allegory or quest.

Since Klein made constant allusion in his writing to a multitude of Jewish, classical and literary sources, the new edition contains some 70 pages of textual and explanatory notes to clarify his references to everything from the Zohar to Milton to the Sistine Chapel.

The edition also contains selections from a previously-published notebook that Klein kept of a 1949 journey he made to Europe, North Africa and Israel, which prefigures the movement in the novel. The editors have annotated the notebook to indicate passages that made it, usually in altered form, into the final manuscript.

Many Canadian-Jewish writers and readers profess a strong allegiance to The Second Scroll that borders on reverence. "If I was going to a desert island, for sure I'd take The Second Scroll with me," says Dr. Shel Krakofsky, a southern Ontario poet.

Nora Gold shines in longer works

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Fortunately for lovers of fiction, Warwick Publishing, a Toronto-based publishing house that usually publishes non-fiction, has departed from its specialty to present Marrow and Other Stories, a debut collection of short stories from Toronto author, Nora Gold.

Gold, a professor at McMaster University, offers seven literary creations of varying lengths in the book. They range from the six-page story Marrow, which previously appeared in the literary journal Parchment, to the 87-page novella Flesh, which shows that Gold, at her best, can be as heart-warming and delightful as Ann Tyler or Anita Brookner.

As a rule, Gold seems to shine when given more room in which to work.

The shorter pieces are interesting but more cerebral than moving. The three longer pieces – Lessons of the Rabbi, Final Movement, and Flesh — reveal a dynamic and masterful authorial imagination that seems to stem directly from the heart.

Her themes centre around women, in particular Jewish women, whose concerns and conflicts involve love and loss, and the painful search for ephemeral ideals that seem to slip away between girlhood and adulthood.

Lessons of the Rabbis is a riveting coming-of-age piece in which a rabbi and his family offer emotional support and shelter to Carla, a teenaged student from an abusive home.

A transgression by the rabbi leaves Carla feeling abandoned, homeless and beyond redemption, like someone who has crashed to the bottom of a heavenly ladder and feels she will never rise again.

Another central character confronts her illusions about love's purity in the first-person story, Final Movement. Although somewhat convoluted, the tale reflects Gold's central thesis that the physical realities of the world interfere with the delicate, other-worldly purity of romantic love, which must exist only for the angels.

This notion emerges most clearly in Flesh. It suggests that all flesh is heir to a diminishment of the holy dream of perfect love.

This remarkable story focuses on two cousins, Eve and Pearl, and their private discussion during the shivah for Pearl's mother.

Set in Montreal, it is filled with warmth, humor, revelation and pain.

Pearl, dysfunctional since her teenaged years, is wasting away. She rarely ventures from her bedroom and almost never goes outside. Eve, a mother, successful professional and former friend and confidante to Pearl, climbs upstairs during the shivah to commune with her cloistered cousin.

Pearl soon reveals that even in her isolation, she had experienced a love relationship with Ricky, the national director of CARE (Canadians for Animal Rights Education). The touching story-within-a-story of Pearl's intense affair with Ricky unfolds.

But caring for Pearl, alas, is something that Ricky proves incapable of in the long run. When she feels loved, Pearl eats and puts some flesh on her bones, but wastes away again after Ricky abandons her. This story is less pessimistic than Lessons of the Rabbi, since Pearl ultimately finds enough reason to resume living.

Flesh shows Gold at the top of her powers. The story closes with a vivid and stunning allusion from our ancient literature, demonstrating beyond a doubt that it is Jewish fiction that Gold is producing.

Nora Gold is scheduled to give a reading Sunday, Nov. 7, at 8 p.m., the Jewish Book Fair, Leah Posluns Theatre, Toronto.

Health

Team approach used in dealing with stress

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —The fast pace of today's lifestyles – the pressure to succeed, the overwhelming advances in technology, and the changing role between parents and children – has led to increased stress in most sectors of the community, according to Dr. Howard Winston, the medical director of the Centre for Health and Sports Medicine.

Winston has developed a team approach to helping individuals deal with stress.

A pilot series of workshops titled, The Positive Challenges of Stress, is a 4-week program which will be held 10 a.m. to noon at the Centre for Health at Bathurst and Glencairn on Nov. 14, 21, 28 and Dec. 5.

The workshops, comprised of four two-hour sessions, will be limited to eight participants.

The topics covered will include nutrition, psychology, therapeutic massage, yoga relaxation techniques and exercise, and concepts of preventive medicine.

The motto of the centre is, "committed to educate, not just rehabilitate," says Winston, a practising physician.

He says individuals tend to cope with stress by using various means, such as drinking, smoking, drugs or excessive eating, which can ultimately be more harmful than the stress.

Winston says people who don't exercise, lack a "release valve" and many of them turn to addictive substances as "a quick and easy way" of alleviating stress. "It is human nature to follow the path of least resistance."

Stress, he notes, can be good stress or bad "but the problem is when there isn't a balance."

He promotes a holistic approach to treating individuals – working with them on a physical, emotional and spiritual level.

Winston will be working with Thelma Feldman, a psychotherapist and yoga instructor; Debbie Cowitz, an adult educator; Karen Stone, a dietitian, Karen Wingrove, a massage therapist; and Dr. Andrew Shaul, a clinical psychologist.

We don't want disease to develop," says Cowitz who will facilitate discussions on how to reduce stressful situations. "Fun is a key word for me – having fun and learning at the same time."

Feldman told The CJN that most people don't realize the importance of breathing properly. "We breath only 20 percent of our capacity and only from the top half of our lungs.

"If you bring in more oxygen, it oxygenates every part of the body and feeds all the cells and organs which brings down stress and has a calming effect on the nervous system."

For more information about the upcoming workshop call 789-CHSM.

Consultation essential in cancer treatment

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The attitude of doctors toward giving cancer patients information to help them make decisions is undergoing a fundamental change, said Dr. Carol Sawka.

"Five years ago we were told to 'butt out' by the general surgeons, but now we are encouraged by their co-operation," said Sawka, CEO of Toronto-Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre.

Sawka said patient decision aids, such as a 26-minute audiotape and an illustrated booklet on breast cancer, are now available, and more will be coming soon on other types of cancer.

The breast cancer tape explains the differences between lumpectomy, or partial excision, and mastectomy, or total excision. It is funded by the Canadian Cancer Society and endorsed by the Ontario Association of General Surgeons.

Sawka said a survey of patients with breast cancer showed that a majority were dissatisfied with their initial consultation and wanted information and photographs they could review at home later.

Speaking to about 300 people at the Civic Garden Centre, most of them cancer patients, she said many patients do not understand what their doctors are saying, particularly after being told they have cancer.

Also, some patients are not good listeners and are not adept at following instructions. They do better with materials they can take home, she said.

Supporting the need for patient decision aids, moderator Mary Sue Douglas said she was diagnosed with breast cancer 11 years ago, but now is free of the disease. "And this is my own hair," she added, a statement that brought a hearty round of applause.

Her cancer had metastasized to her lungs and liver, Douglas said, paying tribute to the Bayview Support Network of which Marlene Greenberg is co-chair.

"It's a labyrinth out there, and the physician and patient are travelling companions," she said.

"When I first heard the diagnosis of breast cancer, I heard one thing and my husband heard another. He [later] asked me if we were in the same room."

Sawka said in one survey of 97 women, 84 percent reported difficulties in communicating with their doctor.

Another survey of 1,012 women in 1997 showed that 22 percent wanted to start treatment right away, 44 percent wanted a shared decision, and 34 percent wanted to delegate responsibility to the doctor. But after their initial consultation, only 42 percent believed they had achieved a proper level of control in decision making.

Declaring that physicians need to be trained in decision making, Sawka said patients should get an audiotape of their consultation and/or a summary letter.

She warned that general information audiotapes about cancer tend to inhibit recall of important information if the cancer did not apply.

Referring to other possible sources, she said in the discussion period that "some of the information on the Internet is garbage and can be dangerous."

Asked about naturopathy, Sawka said information about it and alternative medicine is "far from perfect."

When an audience member asked about different treatments for ethnic groups, she replied, "what is taboo in one culture, is perfectly acceptable in another."

She said the medical world has been guilty of "ageism" in the past. "One should not assume that older women will want a mastectomy."

Baycrest unit helps patients at home

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An 83-year-old woman with multiple health problems who is living alone in a two-storey home is now, in the words of her daughter, "thriving at home" after being cared for by a "dream team."

She was treated at a unique 10-bed unit known as the geriatric assessment treatment unit (GATU) at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Dr. Shelley Veinish, director of the GATU, said.

The woman who suffers from severe arthritis due to osteoporosis was taking so many medications she worried herself sick about it. She was introduced as Mrs. H to a small group attending a lecture in the Ada Starkman lecture series held recently at Baycrest.

Mrs. H's route to good health was not smooth. She was discharged from the GATU after a month, but spent another two months there with pneumonia. She was readmitted after being treated in an acute-care hospital

Veinish said the treatment team of at least a dozen specialists concentrated on reactivation during Mrs. H's second admission, because she was suffering from social isolation.

A key to her recovery was the increase in medication to decrease her level of pain, said pharmacist Allan Mills.

Mills said Mrs. H's worry about drug interactions was real.

He noted that adverse drug interactions is the cause of 25 percent of all hospital admissions of elderly persons and 10 to 15 percent of all emergency admissions.

GATU beds are reserved for frail, elderly persons over 75, with multiple health problems, and mild to moderate cognitive impairment; they do not require acute-care hospitalization, Dr. Veinish said.

Treatment in this unit is covered by OHIP, she said, but a private room is not paid for by the government plan.

"We keep the waiting list short, but under the triage system we may admit a fragile person who is very ill."

She said a medical referral is necessary for admission to the GATU.

One of the benefits of the GATU is that long-standing ailments such as hearing and eye sight problems can be attended to promptly.

In the discussion period, Veinish and Mills said herbal remedies are being studied to see if they fit into the treatment plans.

One of the problems, Mills said, is that often the herbal remedies, with the same name have different ingredients.

Other participants on the panel were Deanna Cohen, social worker; Iris Weinberg, nutritionist; and Eileen Bourret, nurse practitioner.

Barbara Frances, Baycrest Foundation director of development, was the panel chair.

Canadian Scrabble team off to Melbourne for championships

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — These days find Zev Kaufman deeply immersed in a dictionary. Not just any dictionary, but the definitive Chamber's version, with its thousands of words unique to British nomenclature and dialects.

"I'm trying to learn 30,000 British words and terms," Kaufman says. "Like wex, yex and zex. I don't know what they mean, but I don't have to."

As a world-calibre Scrabble player, Kaufman is less concerned with arcane definitions than with unloading a bunch of vowels or consonants mere mortals would be stuck with. Not only that, but he's likely to land an X or Q on a Triple Letter Score.

The 52-year-old contractor and current Toronto Scrabble champ is studying a British lexicon because he and five other Canadians are off on Nov. 4 to the World Scrabble Championship in Melbourne, where the Queen's English will prevail.

The three-day tournament will showcase the English-speaking world's best players through 24 games. The top two finishers will meet in a best-of-five playoff to determine the world's best cross-wordsmith.

Canadian Scrabble teams usually have a proportionally high Jewish component, and it's no different this time. Joining Kaufman will be two other Jewish players: Joel Wapnick, a music professor at McGill University and reigning Canadian champion; and Adam Logan, a young math whiz and recent PhD from Harvard University. Rounding out the field are Albert Hahn, James Cherry and David Boys, the 1995 world champ.

'This is no parlor game'

The current world champ, American Joel Sherman, is also Jewish.

For Kaufman and his teammates, this is no parlor game.

Players pore over boards like chess masters, always seeking the elusive "triple-triple" (landing a high-scoring letter on a Triple Letter Score, and the entire word on a Triple Word Score), and of course, using all seven letters on one turn, which awards 50 additional points.

Kaufman's highest game score is 666. Even higher tallies are not uncommon at this level.

Any word found in an accepted dictionary is allowed. That includes the odd vulgarity and colloquialism, as well as Yiddish and Hebrew terms.

"I once played halutzim (Hebrew for pioneers)," says Kaufman, who's ranked in the top 35 North American players. "I've also played chutzpah, yeshivah and yahrzeit. As long as it's in the dictionary."

To get rid of those pesky vowels, Kaufman advises, try eau (French for water), and for those irritating consonants, go with cwm, a Welsh word meaning a valley on a hillside.

And of course, there's always wex, yex and zex.

Memorial to murdered Israeli athletes is unveiled in Sydney

By RUTH KAHANE GOLDBERG
Special to The CJN

SYDNEY — A memorial to commemorate the 11 Israelis murdered by terrorists at the 1972 Munich Olympic Games was dedicated recently at Homebush Bay, the site of the upcoming Sydney 2000 Olympics.

"Memorials have been dedicated to them in Munich and Israel, however until today there has never been a permanent recognition at the site of any subsequent Olympic city," Australian minister for the Olympics, Michael Knight, read in a letter from the Israeli Olympic Committee.

Calling the attack "the antithesis to the Olympic spirit," Knight said the initiative by two local Jewish businessmen to erect the memorial had gained the "strong support" of the Olympic Co-ordination Authority, the Sydney Organizing Committee for the Olympic Games, and the Australian Olympic Committee.

The dedication was conducted by New South Wales Chief Justice The Honorable J. J. Spigelman, and Australian gold medal Olympian, Shane Gould.

"The transformation by terrorism of the Olympic Village into a theatre for violence was an affront to all participants in the Olympic movement.

"This memorial will stand as dedicated not only to the lives of the individuals who died, but also to the values of universality, inclusiveness and mutual respect which the Olympic ideals embody," Spigelman said.

He was speaking to federal, state and local politicians as well as Olympic officials, members of the Sydney Jewish community and more than 30 members of the 1972 Australian Olympic team.

The memorial is located in the heart of the Olympic Plaza adjacent to the Sydney SuperDome, an area to be used by more than 30,000 people daily during the games.

It is attached to one of 19 lighting towers named after each city that has hosted the summer games.

It holds two commemorative plaques, one engraved with the names of the 11 Israeli athletes, coaches and officials, another with two Hebrew quotes from the Tanach.

Shane Gould, who was 15 years old when competing at Munich, experienced the fear, confusion and disruption that the Black September terrorists caused.

When the attack occurred, she had already competed, winning three gold medals and setting three world records in women's swimming.

After an official day of mourning, the games went on but she was taken into hiding for security and was only brought back for the closing ceremonies.

She said the commemoration brought her "a sense of completion," and that past experience and Olympic ideals should be used to promote a worldwide truce during future Olympic games.

The commemoration was spearheaded by two prominent Sydney businessmen, Geoff Levy and Brian Sherman, a board member of the Sydney Olympic Organizing Committee.

Sherman said in an interview that Sydney's actions should have an important impact on the international Olympic community.

"I think the International Olympic Committee can feel that the deed was done, it has been acknowledged, and we can now go forward, but still continuously acknowledge that it was the darkest of all days in Olympic history. At last it's been put to bed."

The Inside Back

The diary of red beard the writer

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

Day One: As today is Rosh Chodesh Av, it is time for my annual non-shaving term, destined to last until the day after Tisha b'Av.

Day Three: begins to look as if I didn't actually shave (equal to a 3-day yom tov growth); really itchy. Wife tactfully points out I look like a street person.

Day 8: Beard looks like Yasser Arafat's stubble on a good day. I send away to Lubavitch for their free beard-growing kit, guaranteed to grow a fuller beard in two weeks.

Day 9: Beard looks like Yasser Arafat after a three day yom tov.

Day 10: Last night we broke the fast after Tisha b'Av and were up late eating. When I woke up late for morning davening, there was no time to shave. The moment of decision – to leave alone or remove? My yetzer hatov and yetzer hara duke it out; I opt for leaving alone, for now.

Day 12: Perceptive colleagues at office begin to ask "So, are you growing a beard?" Feeling much more mature, philosophical even. Begin to ponder things I don't usually ponder, such as why I am pondering so many things, philosophically speaking.

Day 14. Note beard is coming in rather reddish tint. Check with other bearded persons, who confirm that colour is often lighter than hair. Make note to begin research into possible genetic descent from King David.

Day 20: Beard growing long but still not filling in. Wife gives quizzical look, then shakes head. Interpreted as confusion. Oldest child asks "Are you going to become a rabbi?" Explain that not all rabbis have beards, and that not all persons with beards are rabbis. Not quite sure he gets it.

Day 30: Lubavitch beard-growing kit arrives. Useful tip #1. Don't Shave. Useful tip #2. Believe that Mashiach will come soon. Not sure how this relates to tip #1. Perhaps Mashiach will come before this thing begins to actually look like a beard.

Day 50: Major Crisis. Pre-Rosh Hashanah haircut turns into the beard and moustache trim from Gehennom. Barber trimmed beard, then asked if I wanted moustache "same length". Before I could scream "NO!" he was shortening half of my moustache to 1/16 inch thickness. My kids and wife don't recognize me when I get home. I tell them it's part of my strategy to become a new person by actually looking like a new person. Hope the last 10 years of moustache will grow back before then. Resolve to do my own beard trims from now on.

Day 65: Moustache beginning to grow back. First white facial hair appears in quadrant 3. Pregnant woman on subway offers me her seat. Do I look that old? Panic. Decide to trim it to a half-beard (face only).

Day 75: Still not happy how beard's not filling in. My chin, on the other hand, is growing like crazy. Decided to trim to goatee, to look like a real writer. Find myself with sudden urges to speak French words like genre, motif, avant-garde, wear berets, smoke unfiltered cigarettes, discuss films (as opposed to movies), listen to accordion music, debate with anyone what Sartre really meant, and drink espresso. Not a good sign. Besides, I don't even smoke.

Day 80: Finding trimming is more hassle than shaving. Have another "discussion" with my wife on the matter. She wins. Goatee goes, but moustache stays. One has to stand one's ground for one's principles, after all.

BERRY-RICOTTA CHEESECAKE

Crust: 4 nut biscotti, 1 tbsp canola oil

Preheat oven to 350°F. Lightly coat 9" springform pan with nonstick spray. In food processor, pulse biscotti until finely ground. Add oil and pulse until incorporated. Press crumbs evenly into bottom of prepared pan.

Filling: 4 oz. light cream cheese, softened; 1 cup sugar; 2 cups skim ricotta cheese; 1/2 cup nonfat plain yogurt; 1/3 cup cornstarch; 2 large eggs; 3 large egg whites; 2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice; 2 tsp. grated lemon zest; 1/4 tsp salt

In processor, beat cream cheese until smooth. Add alternatively sugar, ricotta, yogurt, cornstarch, eggs, egg whites, lemon juice, lemon zest and salt. Beat until well blended. Pour into prepared pan. Bake 50-55 mins. or until edges are puffed but centre still jiggles when pan is tapped. Turn off oven; let cheesecake stand, with door open for 1 hr. Transfer to a wire rack; let cool completely. (The top may crack.)

Topping & glaze: 1/4 cup red currant jelly; 2 cups fresh berries, such as halved strawberries blueberries, raspberries and blackberries

Remove pan sides. Arrange berries on top. In a small saucepan, warm jelly over low heat, stirring, until melted. With pastry brush, coat berries with jelly glaze. Refrigerate until cold. Makes 12 servings. (Will keep 1 day covered in refrigerator.)

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

Ever since I turned 14, my body seems to be going nuts. I guess it's puberty, but the worst part of it is that now I have the worst acne. I have big, painful pimples all over my face. I know that most girls with zits use cover up and makeup, but it's not socially acceptable for guys to wear any sort of makeup. Sometimes I am so embarrassed that I don't want to go to school or leave my house. I don't have a job or my own money, so I can't buy expensive pimple medicine myself, and I am too embarrassed to ask my parents. What should I do?

Embarrassed to be Seen

Dear Embarrassed to be Seen,

It is important to know that you are not the only teenager who is dealing with acne problems. Although it may seem that you are the only kid who is worrying about their skin, you are not. Almost everyone, at one time or another, has had a skin problem that has embarrassed them to a certain degree.

The first problem you must overcome before you begin to deal with your acne is your embarrassment about speaking to your parents. Try to remember that your parents have also lived through their teenage years, and have some understanding of the effects of puberty.

Once you can speak to your parents about your skin and explain how self-conscious it makes you, I am sure they will be more than willing to help you get the medicine you need.

If, however, you don't feel as though you can approach your parents, there are other methods that will help. You can go to your doctor and ask for suggestions as to how you can clear up your skin without purchasing expensive medicine. If that is not possible, and medicine is the only way to go, try saving your money or try to get a job in order to buy medicine.

It is important to keep in mind that one day you will grow out of your acne. It is hard to believe it now, but you will have clear skin again. In the meantime, make sure that you continue to keep your skin as clean as possible, and that means washing it every day, twice a day.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

Airline dispute settled

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel have settled a dispute over airspace and landing rights for each other's national airlines – at least for now.

Last Sunday, Canadian Ambassador Michael Bell and Israeli Transport Minister Yitzhak Mordechai reached a temporary agreement that will allow Air Canada to retain its daily, non-stop flights to and from Israel.

Air Canada and El Al reach agreement

Mordechai agreed to Air Canada's request "as a gesture of goodwill," he told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

And according to some reports, Mordechai will ask Israel's Civil Aviation Authority to consider Air Canada's request for more flights to Israel until the end of November, so that the Canadian carrier can bring record numbers of Christian pilgrims eager to mark the new millennium in the Holy Land.

Mordechai instructed the air authority to view the Canadian request for more flights "positively," a ministry spokesperson said, stressing, however, that last Sunday's deal is temporary.

The two sides hope to work out a permanent agreement when Mordechai and his Canadian counterpart, David Collenette, meet in Washington in early December.

The Israeli airline was concerned that if Air Canada's request was not met, Ottawa might close its airspace to Israeli flights en route to U.S. destinations, meaning flights would become longer and burn additional fuel.

Ottawa denied making any threats or discussing possible retaliatory measures, but a commercial attache at the Canadian Embassy in Tel Aviv warned that El Al should not take its North American overflight rights for granted.

Only a week ago, negotiations between Bell and Mordechai fell flat, with the transport minister telling a press conference that he was rejecting Air Canada's request.

The dispute began heating up last winter, when Air Canada requested that its weekly flights to Israel be increased from four to seven.

Israel's air authority said no, but allowed the airline to boost its flights to one a day during the summer months only.

Air Canada wanted that arrangement continued because of the potential for year-end tourists. But Israel rejected the request, pointing out that Air Canada was breaking its end of the compromise by continuing to fly to Israel daily beyond the summer season.

The temporary agreement does not address a major sticking point between the two airlines.

OTTAWA — Israeli Justice Minister Yossi Beilin paid an official visit to Ottawa last week to sign a historic legal treaty between Canada and Israel.

The Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty, signed by Beilin and his Canadian counterpart, Anne McClellan, calls for both nations to grant each other "the widest possible measure of mutual assistance" in criminal matters, including locating people and objects; serving documents; exchanging data, such as criminal and government records; executing requests for search and seizure; locating and seizing the proceeds of crime; and transferring detained persons.

Observers such as the Canada-Israel Committee welcomed the treaty as a tool that will enable both countries to share information in the investigation and prosecution of crimes.

The groundbreaking treaty will also open the way for the mutual lending of exhibits in criminal matters, taking evidence and statements, and making witnesses available.

CANADA

Order of Ontario

TORONTO — Susan Charness, Victor Feldbrill and Maxwell Goldhar were among 22 recipients of the Order of Ontario last week. The awards recognize people who enrich others' lives. Charness runs a talent agency specializing in actors and models with disabilities; Feldbrill is a violinist and conductor dedicated to promoting Canadian music; and Goldhar, a businessman, was honored for his community service.

Shul's 90th Marked

CALGARY — This city's oldest synagogue will mark its 90th anniversary. The House of Jacob-Mikveh Israel will celebrate the milestone with a gala banquet Nov. 14. The synagogue was founded in 1909 by Alberta Jewish pioneer Jacob Lyon Diamond.

ISRAEL

No Land for Peace

JERUSALEM — A group of Orthodox rabbis in Israel is planning to renew a religious ruling banning the exchange of land for peace. Giving up lands where Jews live will create "a risk to the lives of those Jews," Rabbi David Druckman, a member of a group known as Pikuach Nefesh, or Saving Lives, said last week.

Town Touts Weddings

JERICHO — A former Arab Israeli legislator hopes to help make the desert town of Jericho bloom – with wedding bouquets. Abdel Wahab Darawshe said his company hopes to help Israeli couples interested in a civil ceremony tie the knot in the self-rule town, in services performed by Palestinian justice officials.

'Millennialists' Detained

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials plan to deport 21 people who belong to apocalyptic Christian groups. Israel rounded up the 21, most of them Americans, last week. It was the third time since January that officials detained members of Christian groups flocking to the country to witness what they believe will be the start of Armageddon on the eve of the new millennium.

WORLD

Papon Had Help

PARIS — The short-lived flight to freedom in Switzerland by convicted Nazi collaborator Maurice Papon was organized by a clandestine network of aging French right-wingers, the London Sunday Times reported. A French inquiry has established that admirers of Papon smuggled him out of France on the eve of his appeal last month.

Jews Press New President

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jews held a large rally last week, calling on the nation's president-elect Fernando de la Rua to find those responsible for the March 1992 car bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires and the July 1994 bombing of a Jewish centre there.

Indian Jews Leaving

NEW DELHI — Many of the remaining Jews in Cochin, India, are heading for Israel in order to beat a shortage of marriage partners. During the past 50 years, the community has shrunk from 2,400 to 60, with just 18 Jews left in Cochin's historic Jew Town, site of the city's only functioning synagogue.

Anti-Semitism Soars

VIENNA — The head of Austria's Jewish community said threats against Jews have increased 10-fold during the recent election campaign of Jorg Haider and his far-right Freedom party, which placed second in the recent elections. Ariel Musikant said Jews have experienced a significant rise in hate mail, threatening phone calls and harassment on the street. An estimated 12,000 Jews live in Austria.

French Stamp Irks

BEIRUT — Lebanon reportedly plans to ban mail into the country that bears a French stamp featuring the Israeli flag. Lebanon's postal service will return all mail carrying the stamp, which was issued in January to honor 50 years of French-Israeli diplomatic relations.

Request for Property

BUDAPEST — Hungarian Jewish leaders met U.S. officials here recently to request the return of property looted from Hungarian Jews by American forces at the end of World War II. The request came after a U.S. presidential commission found that in May 1945, American soldiers took the property, originally looted from Hungarian Jews by the Nazis.

Conference to Explore Jewish Poverty in Canada

WINNIPEG — Jewish family and social service professionals from across Canada will gather here this month for the National Conference on Jewish Poverty, the first meeting of its kind in this country.

The conference, slated for Nov. 6 and 7, is sponsored by the Association of Jewish Family & Children's Agencies (AJFCA) of Canada.

An estimated 15.7 percent of Canadian Jews live below the poverty line.

The goal of the conference, according to chair Richard Uditsky of Montreal, is to develop strategies for advocacy and service delivery.

The conference will begin with a comprehensive overview of Canadian poverty, presented by Prof. Allan Moscovitch of Carleton University's faculty of social work.

Rabbi Lindsey Bat-Joseph of Edmonton will address how Jewish poverty affects identity, assimilation, communal obligations, expectations and standards.

Other topics to be explored include job-search initiatives, and how agencies, synagogues and federations can work more closely together.

For information, call Jewish Child and Family Services in Winnipeg at 204-477-4730.

Israeli consul general says goodbye to Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —If Jehudi Kinar had succeeded at nothing else during his tenure here, he would have been satisfied to see his idea for an Israel Studies chair at the University of Toronto come to fruition.

The chair is in place and awaiting a chair holder, he is happy to report. But his involvement in this project represented only one aspect of his work as as Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada for the past four years.

Kinar has also played a role in nurturing Canada-Israel business and cultural ventures; he has travelled in his official capacity as far west as Vancouver and as far north as Nunavut, liaising with Jews and non-Jews in the public and private sectors; and he has served as Israel's representative at countless functions.

"Canada has been altogether a wonderful story," he said in an interview at his Toronto office last week, reflecting on his term here. He will return to Israel at the beginning of December, when Meir Romem assumes the post.

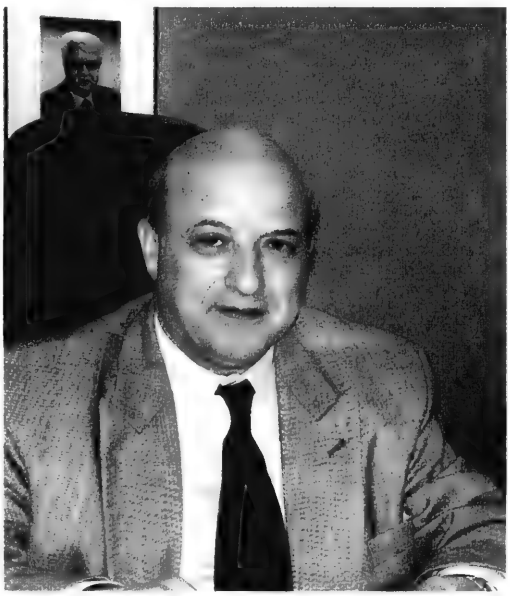
Kinar considers himself "lucky and blessed" to have been here for Israel's 50th anniversary celebrations, and spoke fondly of the warmth of the Toronto community.

"This is a wonderful community," he said. "They made it easy for us to do our work, and easy for us to make friends."

Moving here with his wife Ruti and daughter Yael (an older son, Yaron, was serving in the IDF) just before Rosh Hashanah in 1995, the family was welcomed with food and yom tov invitations. New friends "made our lives so meaningful here," he said.

Kinar noted, however, that the Toronto Jewish community is so close-knit that it's not always easy for newcomers.

He credits his wife – "my right and left hand" – with making his work possible. In addition to her backing at home, Ruti, a Sabra, became involved in a number of organizations here, and in the planning of an Israeli art exhibition.



Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar. [Frances Kraft photo]

The couple met five days after he immigrated to Israel in 1969.

The consul general, who speaks seven languages, was born in the Netherlands in 1941. He remembers the proclamation of the State of Israel in 1948, and seeing people holding Israeli flags for the first time.

Although he couldn't articulate it as a child of seven, as an adult he remembers "being part of a tolerated minority. I wanted to be part of a majority, and that, for me, was Israel."

At one time he wanted to study medicine, but decided against it because of the high number of doctors in Israel.

A graduate of Switzerland's Geneva University, where he was chair of the Swiss Jewish student organization, Kinar has a BA in Dutch, English, French and German languages, and a master's degree in political science.

He has served with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs for most of his adult life. Prior to his stint in Toronto, he served in The Hague from 1976-81; in Bonn, Germany in the mid-1980s; and in San Francisco from 1993 to 1995.

It's not uncommon for an oleh to be an Israeli diplomat; he and his colleagues from places like England and the former Soviet Union, are part of "a small faction," he noted.

One of Kinar's first challenges here was dealing with the slaying of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in November 1995. "It was like the whole world broke down," he recalled.

Among his most compelling memories of that time was his realization, en route to a community commemoration at Centennial Arena, that what he thought was an ordinary traffic jam was caused by thousands of people heading to the same event.

Despite Rabin's death, Kinar retains an optimistic outlook, he said.

"Keep on doing what you're doing," are his parting words of advice. "If you want to keep the community as it is today, try to get as much Jewish education as possible for your children."

Perhaps that explains his particular pride in the Israel studies chair.

Jews at the forefront

The Jewish people commemorates Yom Hashoah on the 27th day of the month of Nisan. The date was decreed by the Knesset and accepted by most as a 24-hour pause to ponder the imponderable, a cyclic prod of the collective memory, an appropriate time each year for national, communal and religious reflection on the Shoah.

Of course, the people who "survived" the Shoah need no legislative fiat to set aside time to reflect on what happened. The memory of what happened is ever-present; it hovers close by, just over every horizon of every day; it forms the outline and it shapes the contours of the shadows that fill the darkened rooms each night.

But diminishing in number, alas, are the people who emerged from the Nazis' nearly complete destruction of European Jewry. Diminishing too is their vigor and their ability to recount what must be recounted to their children, to fellow Jews and to the rest of the world.

That is why communities throughout the Jewish world have established Holocaust Education Week or its equivalent.

The truth must be recorded.

The record must be safeguarded.

Safeguarding that record is the imperative and sacred obligation of each successive generation.

But there are many ways of doing so: personal testimony, museums, films, supervised visits to the sites of the death camps and focused programs such as Holocaust Education Week.

Many more ways to safeguard the record however, must be devised to counter the increasingly malevolent attempts to mock the truth and to distort the record.

There are Holocaust deniers, individuals who inhabit society's margins, haunted by their own pitiful inconsequentiality, champions of nothing more substantial than their miserably misshapen vanity.

But even their denials must be rebutted, lest the silences in the street be filled with their mistruths.

There are racist, white supremacists whose constant companions are paranoia and hatred. Because they wield guns as well as ignorance, they too must be "rebutted" lest they be allowed to terrorize and victimize others.

Now, there are also "mainstream" politicians who hug a veneer of respectability close to their business suits, while underneath, they hold tightly to the same sickening xenophobic trash that the Nazi brownshirts boldly bore in the 1930s.

Pat Buchanan is the prototype of this kind of politician in the United States. Some weeks ago in this space, I wrote about him and about the danger he poses to the truth and to the integrity of the record.

Unfortunately, there appears to be a rising number of Buchanan-like politicians around the world.

Last month, the Freedom party of Austria finished a strong second in the elections held there. The key plan in the party's platform is a nationalistic, anti-immigrant screed, calling for an "an end to too many foreigners."

The party's leader, Joerg Haider, evokes very strong suspicions, especially among Austria's remaining Jews, for, among other things, having described the Waffen SS as "men of character," and for the coded anti-Semitic imagery he used in his election campaign.

The political climate in Austria may already have become more hospitable to far-right, reactionary racists.

A news item last weekend reported the arrest of a small neo-Nazi group "seeking to overthrow the Austrian government."

Eight people were arrested. According to police, all of them had contacts with other convicted neo-Nazis in Austria and fellow racists in Germany, the Czech Republic, Britain and the United States.

Two weeks ago, in Switzerland, the right-wing People's party under the leadership of Cristoph Blocher recorded a similarly strong second place showing in the elections.

Like its Austrian cousin, the People's party of Switzerland proposes a heavily nationalistic, anti-immigrant policy.

And like Haider, Blocher is the demagogic chief proponent of those anti-"foreigner" policies.

These men – the Buchanans, Haiders and Blochers – and their policies must also be rebutted.

We, the Jewish people, our "antennae" buzzing with the encrypted codewords of intolerance and hate from these "mainstream politicians," must be at the forefront, rebutting their odious messages.

In every land where Jews reside or have resided, we were all once immigrants. Indeed, as God reminds us almost 100 times in the Tanach, we were all once "strangers" in a strange land. We must never forget that. And woe unto us, and to the world, if we do.

Our rebuttal, of course, begins with, reasserts and reaffirms Judaism's core value, the underpinning of our ethically monotheistic belief system, and that stands in full frontal opposition to the masked and unmasked hatred uttered by all Buchanan-like politicians, namely: all human life is precious.

That rebuttal is also at the centre of the Holocaust Education Week programs being held in large and small communities all across Canada.

New foundation to promote Canadian history

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Charles Bronfman, chair of the CRB Foundation, has announced that he will donate up to $25 million – matching dollar for dollar with other private-sector contributions – to a fundraising campaign for Historica, a new Canadian history foundation.

Historica, co-founded by Bronfman and L.R. (Red) Wilson, chair of the BCE Inc., is dedicated to increasing awareness of Canada's history and peoples.

With the development of its own Web site, Historica will offer such things as free access to the Canadian Encyclopedia; an up-to-date directory of Canadian Web sites; firsthand accounts of Canadian events and achievements; moderated chat groups; multimedia stories; and bulletin boards. At the moment, Historica can be accessed at www.heritage project .ca/histori.ca/index html

Its own Web site – www.histori.ca will be up and running in the near future.

Other ideas include developing school programs, lecture series, essay contests and a travel exhibit on Canadian prime ministers, and creating a volunteer organization in every province.

At the recent launch, Bronfman said that while history is important to Canadians,"it is still not a core subject in many provincial jurisdictions and even if it is, many students and teachers are frustrated by how it is taught. The Internet has information on just about everything, but good Canadian sites are often lost in the sheer volume of information."

Historica intends to bridge the divide, he said, between the potential of our new information age and our inability as Canadians to know each others' stories.

Historica's mandate, said Wilson, is to make Canadian history a priority – to make it more accessible, more enjoyable and more exciting for Canadians of all ages.

Executive director of Historica is Thomas Axworthy, and founding supporters include the Royal Bank of Canada, Imasco Limited, McClelland & Stewart, Westcoast Energy Inc., Bell Canada, CanWest Global Communications Corp., The Toronto-Dominion Bank, the Bank of Nova Scotia, George Weston Ltd., CAE Inc., McCain Foods Limited, Fishery Products International Limited, Maritime Broadcasting Inc., and Aliant Inc.

Bingo fraud charges laid

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Richmond Hill couple has been arrested for allegedly defrauding the public through a bingo that was run in the name of a well-known lodge of B'nai Brith Canada.

Last month, York Region Police and the Ontario Provincial Police's Alcohol and Gaming Commission arrested Harvey Kosloff, 54, and his wife, Rosemary, 52, for running an allegedly fraudulent bingo at the Aurora Bingo Centre.

Police said the centre was leased to Canyon Lodge. But there is no indication of any involvement by B'nai Brith.

According to a statement from York Region Police, the lodge was licensed to operate at the centre.

The alleged offence is said to have occurred between 1994 and early 1999.

Police say the two accused "have benefited personally for a total of $136,250."

Canyon Lodge, with 47 dues paying members, is a well-known lodge of B'nai Brith, and was founded in the mid-1960s by residents in the Canyon Avenue area.

B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant told The CJN that the bingo was "a rogue operation" and "unknown to B'nai Brith," or to Canyon Lodge.

He said his organization has cooperated fully with police.

Dimant confessed to being surprised that the allegations relate to a period stretching over five years. "It fell between the cracks," he said.

B'nai Brith, which is heavily dependent on gambling to raise funds, directs all revenue from gaming to the B'nai Brith Foundation, which re-distributes money to lodges and other activities, Dimant explained.

The Kosloffs were released on their own recognizance and will appear in a Newmarket court Nov. 22, charged with fraud.

Beilin pays tribute to Rabin

By ANNA TURKIENICZ
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Israeli Minister of Justice Yossi Beilin had just finished his personal reminiscences of Yitzhak Rabin at a recent memorial when the lights went out.

Yahrzeit candles, which had been lit in the Borochov Cultural Centre in memory of the former prime minister of Israel, were the only lights in the hall after a neighborhood blackout brought the evening to an early end.

Before the lights went out, Beilin drew the audience back to Rabin's early political years.

"Over the years," Beilin recalled, "Rabin was a friend and a rival. We had many disputes and many agreements.

"Rabin was one of the most sincere people on earth," Beilin said. "You always knew when he was with you and when he wasn't."

During the rally that preceded Rabin's assassination, Beilin remembered Rabin's words were: "This rally must send a message... that the people of Israel want peace."

'He was one of the most sincere people on earth'

Beilin then recalled how a copy of the Hebrew song Shir Hashalom (Song of Peace), which had been in Rabin's pocket during the rally, was covered in Rabin's blood after the assassination.

"The song, Shir Hashalom, was a provocative song when it first came out in the late 1960s," Beilin said.

It came out between the 1967 and 1973 wars, and at that time, Israel Radio decided on its own not to broadcast it, Beilin said. "In many ways, Rabin was killed for the cause of that song."

Beilin also recalled the first time he saw Rabin. It was just before the Six Day War, he said, during the yamei hamtana (waiting days).

Beilin was just a private in the IDF and he saw a helicopter arrive while he was stationed near Beersheva.

"From my position," Beilin said "I could see his hat and my commanders, and I said to myself, 'It will be OK.'"

Rabin had a presence that said everything would be OK, and all Israelis somehow felt this, Beilin said. "When Rabin died, it was as if he betrayed this feeling.

"It was clear that we had counted on him too much."

Beilin said it took more than Rabin himself to prove to the people that the path towards peace was the right path.

"We got used to the state of emergency. It helped us to explain some problems, and repress others." Beilin said.

What is happening today in Israel is a lesson from Rabin's death, he said. The government has learned that you cannot make peace with just the majority convinced that it is the right path.

"You have to educate and convince more than the majority that what you are doing is the right thing," he said.

Beilin is also a member of the Knesset constitution law and justice committee, and the committee for the advancement of the status of women.

Some of his previous positions have included deputy minister of finance, deputy minister of foreign affairs and minister of economics and social development.

Beilin received his PhD in political science from Tel Aviv University and has published several books on Israel.

The Yitzhak Rabin Memorial was sponsored by the Labor Zionist Alliance, Na'amat Canada, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Habonim Dror Zionist Youth Movement and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

Historic legal treaty signed

Experts say the treaty will make it much more difficult for Israeli fugitives to find haven here, and vice-versa. It is expected to expedite criminal proceedings and remove barriers to prosecutions in both countries.

Joe Wilder, national chair of the CIC, said the treaty "is another important illustration of how growing bilateral ties between Canada and Israel are resulting benefits for both countries."

Apart from signing the treaty, Israel and Canada also signed a joint declaration of intent on co-operation in law, which will facilitate the exchange of lawyers, judges, legal scholars and government officials from both countries.

Beilin's Oct. 25 visit coincided with the opening of the safe passage route between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

"I am very optimistic about the prospects of peace with the Palestinians," said Beilin, who played a major role in the negotiations which led to the signing of the Oslo accords.

"I feel there is a will on both sides," he told the National Press Club.

"The opening of the safe passage is for many of us a dream come true ...It is another sign of what is happening with the peace process."

In response to a question about possible compensation for Palestinians who fled or were forced out during the 1948 and 1967 wars, Beilin said, "We are not blind to the suffering of the Palestinians. The issue of refugees is one of the main issues on our agenda. I see this issue as an opening for understanding, rather than an impediment.

"We should deal not with solving the historical roots of the conflict, but with solving the conflict itself," he said. "In my view, once we have peace with the Palestinians, there should be no Palestinians in the world in the status of refugee."

While in Ottawa, Beilin also met with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, updating them on progress in the Middle East peace process since Prime Minister Ehud Barak's government came to power.

Beilin encouraged Canada to continue contributing to Arab-Israeli reconciliation as the gavel holder of the Multilateral Working Group on Refugees.

U.S. sleuths track fate of St. Louis passengers

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Holocaust sleuths Scott Miller and Sarah Ogilvie, the search continues.

Holocaust Education Week

The two researchers with the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington have spent years combing through old files, documents, telephone books and even records of chevrah kadishahs to find people who had been passengers aboard the St. Louis, the ill-fated luxury liner that became a microcosm of the world's indifference toward the Holocaust.

Miller and Ogilvie opened Holocaust Education Week in Toronto last Thursday at the Sephardic Kehila Centre with an account of their detective work in tracking the fates of the 937 refugees who were aboard the St. Louis 60 years ago.

After years of dogged work and slogging through mountains of records, the two have closed files on all but 10 of the passengers.

The storied vessel, whose plight was dramatized in the 1976 Hollywood movie Voyage of the Damned, left Hamburg, Germany, in May 1939, destined for a safe Cuba. On board were mostly German Jews fleeing Hitler's madness.

But the ship was denied entry to Cuba, save for 29 passengers. Desperate appeals to the United States, Canada and other countries to grant the remaining refugees asylum were all turned down.

The St. Louis was forced to return to Europe. Only at the last moment did four countries – Britain, France, Belgium and the Netherlands – agree to take in about 200 passengers each.

But when the Nazis overran the latter three countries within a year, Jews became their first victims.

An estimated half of the passengers aboard the ship ended up dying in the camps, ghettos, or in hiding, falling victim to the Holocaust they were so sure they would avoid.

The story of the St. Louis is where the Holocaust and American history intersect, noted Miller, because most of the passengers expected eventually to make their way to the United States.

Ironically, Miller said, he and Ogilvie made good use of meticulous records kept by the Nazis. They also advertised in newspapers around the world, and used old phone books to track the passengers' fates.

"It was easier to find the dead than the living," Miller remarked.

The two researchers focused on the Washington Heights section of New York City, which became the largest German-Jewish neighborhood after the war. Six former St. Louis passengers still live there.

And two live in Canada: Guenter Krebs of Montreal and Ursula Miller of Toronto. Miller, who was aboard the ship with her mother and other relatives as a 17-year-old, was taken in by Britain. She joined Miller and Ogilvie for a question-and-answer session.

Miller, now a great-grandmother, said the episode left her "extremely disappointed" in war-time U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt, whose nation was the first ally to refuse the St. Louis passengers asylum.

It's all about priorities

Hockey is to Canada as water is to ice. It is part of the country's very definition, part of the deep structure of our national identity. That is why some of the Canadian NHL franchises, in particular the financially challenged Ottawa Senators, have placed the issue of government aid at centre ice of the national political arena.

But most governments have been reluctant to offer financial assistance to the hockey teams. And rightly so. It would be unconscionable, despite the potential injury to our collective psyche, to open the public purse to sports franchises, while we avert our eyes to the outstretched hands of the homeless, to the parents of children living at or below the poverty line, to the teenagers and young adults unable or unwilling to incur the debt needed to pursue post-secondary school studies.

As its contribution on the side of the troubled NHL franchises, the government of Ontario last week enabled the reduction or elimination of municipal property taxes on privately owned sports arenas. It argued that by doing so, it was merely "levelling the [taxation] playing field" with non-privately owned sports arenas.

But how, in good conscience, can it intervene, even indirectly, to spare hockey teams from paying taxes, when it does not do so, in the same manner, say, to spare developers from the taxes that prevent them from bringing on-stream more affordable rental housing, or to spare impoverished parents from paying taxes on the commodities they must purchase for their children, or to spare students from paying the cloying, debilitating interest rates (read taxes) on their student loans?

It's all about priorities. And the highest priority must always be the basic humanitarian needs of shelter, food, education and dignity.

Mauritania's example

Most people do not know where it is and would be hard pressed even to find Mauritania on a map. It lies on the west coast of Africa, north of Senegal, stretching eastward from the Atlantic Ocean into the Sahara Desert. Some two million people live there, almost all Muslims. Its capital is Nouakchott.

Last week, Mauritania became the third Arab country, after Egypt in 1979 and Jordan in 1994 to establish full diplomatic relations with Israel. The agreement between the two states was signed in Washington by the countries' foreign ministers in the presence of U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. The location, of course, was more than simply facilitative; it was strategic. Mauritania will undoubtedly benefit in tangible ways by spinning closer to Washington's orbit. Its mostly agricultural economy will also surely benefit by its presumed access to the advanced agri-technical expertise of the Jewish state. Israel too can be pleased that it has taken another step, albeit modest and mostly symbolic, on the long, winding, arduous path towards "normal" relations with the Muslim world. It's not yet a trend. Three states will not generate any peer pressure on the remaining 17 members of the League of Arab States to exchange ambassadors with Israel. However, there are diplomatic whispers that Bahrain and Yemen may be next. But Mauritania's example is indeed another click on the rusty, jagged-spoked wheel away from the status quo.

Defends use of birth name

Re: letter by Stuart McCarthy (CJN, Oct. 21). His insistence that the use of my late sister's birth name is an affront to his sensibilities is a vindictive and incredible insult to Ina and all those who knew her during her short life. The Swedler family is proud of Ina's accomplishments as a mother, journalist, sister and daughter. My family's use of her birth name helps us to reach out to the community to raise money for research into a cure for diabetes, where the Swedler family name is well known.

As far as McCarthy's claim to holding title to photographs and the like that appear in the book Ina's Way, my only response is that he does not hold a copyright on the wonderful memories my sister left behind.

Ina's role as a devoted mother to Joshua will be her lasting legacy; even in her illness, she remained his primary caregiver, and was a loving and caring parent to her son.

Immigration proposal — I

In response to the article on proposed immigration policy (CJN, Oct. 1): We think that this new plan will not be successful.

First of all, every society must have different groups within its population, and tradespeople are an important group in society. Just as a factory can't exist without workers, cleaners, electricians, so, too, society can't exist without bakers, waiters, hairdressers, cashiers, and so on.

Secondly, motivation is important, and this does not depend on an educational level; it depends only on one's character, purpose and mental strength.

But most important, in our opinion, is the ability to adapt, to be flexible, and to be able to take a job, even if it's outside one's profession, and to become a contributing member of one's new country.

Immigration proposal — II

I don't agree with the federal government's new blueprint for immigration. No society has only highly educated people. Society needs a lot of skilled tradespeople. So why does the government want to reduce their part of the immigration quota? Good knowledge of English or French is important, but more important is motivation, the ability to work hard and psychological stability. I think that the opportunity to immigrate to Canada mustn't depend on educational level.

Defends prices in Israel

Having just returned from a fabulous three-week vacation in Israel, I read with grave concern "What price life in Israel" (CJN, Oct. 7). Robert Sarner need only visit Toronto to understand that Israel does not have a monopoly on the concept of the market economy. In Toronto, we have a 15 percent tax (PST + GST). One-bedroom apartments, unfurnished, rent for $700 to $1,000 a month. As for ice cream, who wouldn't buy the best? I pay at least $3.50 for a two-scoop ice cream cone in Toronto. I ate in a nice restaurant in Rehovot and paid only 103 NIS ($37.25) for two people. I bought a CD of the local heartthrob Yael Golan on Ben Yehuda in Jerusalem for only 41 NIS ($14.68), and Shlomo Artzi's double CD for only 40 NIS.

As in Toronto, if you're willing to look hard enough, you can find cheaper prices. Eilat and the shuks offer the best prices for music because of the tax break.

Your quote for deodorant is fairly accurate. Israel's Super Pharm sells a stick at the regular price of 25 NIS ($9.10); however, it may be on sale for 20 NIS ($7.20). In Petach Tikvah, Beauty Centre sells the same deodorant for 15 NIS ($5.40).

What about the price of public transportation? I travelled return from Tel Aviv to Eilat and paid only 104 NIS ($37). I paid only $1.50 to travel by bus within any city, and Israel's bus fleet is far more comfortable than the buses we have here in Toronto.

Seeks daughter here

I am trying to find the daughter of a Holocaust survivor. The survivor's name is Mira Meller, born in Stopnica, Poland, in 1912. She came to Canada after the war and settled in Winnipeg. She married a man whose name was Isser, possibly from Toronto.

I do not know if she is still alive. They had one daughter who may be living in Toronto, but I do not know her first name or if she has a married name. I would appreciate hearing from her or from anyone who can put me in touch with her.

Resposibilities of Kashrut council bring accountability

By ARI N. KAPLAN

Readers of the Canadian Jewish News are probably at least mildly familiar with the Levitts kosher meats case. The Montreal-based Levitts Kosher Foods Inc. sued three Toronto rabbis on the local Va'ad Ha'Kashrut, Toronto's principal kosher supervisory council (also known as the Kashruth Council or COR), in connection with a letter sent by the Va'ad to a number of kosher restaurants and establishments under COR supervision.

Basically, Levitts alleged that this letter effectively prevented the continued sale of its fresh kosher meat in COR establishments, and accordingly, claimed that the effect of this letter unlawfully damaged its reputation as a kosher meat producer and seller, and interfered with its pre-existing commercial relationships.

The case never made it to trial. In July, the Ontario Superior Court of Justice granted the Va'ad's motion for a stay of proceedings, that is, the court suspended the lawsuit in its tracks. The stay was ordered based on the long-standing legal truism that ordinary secular courts are hesitant to resolve substantive issues touching upon "religious belief and conscience." The court held that the merits of Levitts' dispute with the Va'ad should be decided at a beit din (rabbinical court).

The Levitts case serves as an invitation to the Jewish community to reflect upon and evaluate the manner in which kashrut is regulated. Ultimately, there are broader implications that may flow from this case. However, Rome was not built in a day, and in Jerusalem's case, we still wait while the Messiah tarries.

A background to the Levitts dispute may be helpful. Levitts produces and sells kosher deli and fresh meat products. All of its meat has glatt-kosher hashgachah (certifying its meat as strictly kosher) from Montreal's Va'ad Ha'ir (MK) as well as from the Baltimore-based Star-K. It is important to note that while Levitts reportedly does not have, nor did it ever apply for COR hashgachah, the Va'ad has not alleged that Levitts meat is not kosher.

Since about 1977, Levitts sold its deli meat, but not its fresh meat, in Toronto COR restaurants and establishments. It sold its fresh meat in non-COR establishments (e.g. large supermarket chains), as well as out of its Toronto store. It had been the Va'ad's custom not to interfere with the sale of Levitts deli meat in COR establishments since historically, kosher deli meat has been less scrutinized than kosher fresh meat.

In recent years, some COR establishments and restaurants began to sell and use Levitts fresh meat products, partially on the basis that Levitts had gained a level of trust among these establishments and their clientele by acquiring certification from the strict and highly regarded Star-K in addition to Levitts' longstanding certification under MK.

In 1997, the Va'ad sent memoranda to COR establishments and restaurants advising them that if they continued to sell or use fresh kosher meat not approved by the Va'ad (which by inference singled out Levitts) then they risked revocation of their COR certification.

We heard at the court motion that the Va'ad relied on two halachic principles, adopted as COR policy in recent years, to justify its 1997 decree.

First, the Va'ad led evidence that since Levitts' principal shareholders were not shomrei Shabbat, they did not have the requisite level of trust and credibility among strict adherents to kashrut. Second, the Va'ad expressed concern that Levitts being a Montreal-based corporation was inconsistent with the Va'ad's recent policy of shchitat chutz (ritual slaughtering from outside). Shchitat chutz requires that a preference be afforded to local shchitah, (by Toronto-based producers of fresh meat).

According to the Va'ad, the shomer Shabbat and shchitat chutz policies were implemented in the midst of a "return to meticulousness in the observance of the precepts of Judaism."

This issue is neither limited nor unique to the Toronto community. The court also observed that Montreal is a "closed city" and that Levitts there is, in fact, protected by a similar shchitat chutz policy. (There is also a shmerut Shabbat policy, from which Levitts is exempt, because it got its MK certification before the policy was implemented.)

In essence, the Va'ad was saying that despite the fact that everyone knows that Levitts meat is kosher, the Va'ad is nevertheless obligated by its constituency, that is, Toronto's observant community, to determine whether or not Levitts met its recently adopted, new standards of kashrut – namely, compliance with shmerut Shabbat and shchitat chutz. (Incidentally, the Va'ad also presented evidence that persons who were not shomrei Shabbat, but who had acquired COR certification for their businesses prior to the shomer Shabbat policy taking effect, were exempt from the application of this policy).

The differentiation in this case between what is kosher and what meets the Va'ad's standard of kosher has the same effect on Levitts in respect to the sale and use of its product. The policy implies that Levitts is not kosher enough for those who comprise Toronto's observant community and who rely on the Va'ad for peace of mind when they eat or shop in COR-supervised establishments. Given the historically wide sphere of influence that the Va'ad has enjoyed in the Toronto kosher food industry, the effect of the decree is that for all intents and purposes, Levitts is not institutionally kosher in Toronto.

By ordering the stay of proceedings, we can infer that in essence, the court in the Levitts case was deeming that the parties, by virtue of their practice, custom, and business, implicitly agreed to have their disputed matters resolved internally rather than in court. This is consistent with the halachic principles of archaot shel nochrim and beit din shel hedyotes, namely, that Jewish law generally frowns upon litigation before laypersons in the secular courts. (This topic presents its own world of internal complexities and contradictions for those of us who are both observant Jews and practise law.)

However, as religious commentators have also observed, "the prohibition of going to non-Jewish courts is rooted in the fear that Torah laws will become forgotten and hence, for practical purposes, nullified." (See R. Simcha Krauss, Litigation in Secular Courts, Journal of Halacha and Contemporary Society, Vol. III).

This latter notion is instructive as we reflect upon the role of COR in relation to the very public to whom COR is responsible, namely, the community that follows Torah laws, and more generally, everybody in the Jewish community who cares about kashrut.

Historically, the Va'ad finds its source of authority in the Middle Ages when Jews were legally segregated by the state, and culturally isolated from the outside world. The framework of the self-governed kehilah (Jewish community) saw its leadership concentrated in the hands of a group of four to 10 respected parnassim (wardens) who were responsible for all social, economic and religious regulatory matters.

Above are a shochet's seals of kashrut, Manheim, Germany, 1745. In the top photo is the store sign of kosher butcher in the mid-19th century: "Kosher meat available here."

For matters of kashrut, they were assisted by memunim (overseers), who also supervised prices as well as weights and measures. The memunim were principally honorary, unpaid appointments that took on a political-governmental character. This internal, self-governance model existed for centuries and was expressly recognized (and required) by the state or kingdom in which Jews lived, be it Poland-Lithuania, Persia or Morocco.

The Va'ad today is the modern heir to the memunim of the Middle Ages, but not quite their beneficiary. On one hand, in recognition that in the past, each kehilah had its own leadership structure and governance model, Toronto's Va'ad today also recognizes that there are a plenitude of kosher supervisory bodies, each of whom has its own constituency (e.g. Toronto's Sephardi kashrut council, Montreal's MK, Baltimore's Star-K, etc.). The Va'ad led in evidence at the Levitts court motion that "there is no obligation [on any kosher supervisory body] to accept the certification of another."

On the other hand, the Va'ad acknowledges that its authority comes more than anywhere else from below, i.e., COR describes its constituency as "the large group of consumers who purchase kosher- supervised products." Indeed, it was, after all, on the basis of the community's "return to meticulousness in ... observance" that purportedly drove the Va'ad to adopt its stricter policies in the first place.

What comes with such responsibility and trust is accountability. Toronto's kosher-purchasing community should insist that if it is not already, the Va'ad should be a meaningfully transparent forum in regards to its processes, decisions and certifications. For example, while it is true that the Toronto community has become more observant in the past number of years, one wonders who exactly initiated or requested the implementation of the shchitat chutz and shomer Shabbat policies?

What public data was collected by COR? Was there a meaningful opportunity for open and public debate and equal representation before the policies were implemented? Was such debate publicized and the findings reported? What was the role of COR's "lay board of community leaders," which presumably represents a cross-section of the Va'ad's entire constituency, in recommending the policies, and on what basis and for what term is the board appointed?

Intuitively, one would expect that aside from local Toronto butchers, there would be little fear in the Toronto Jewish community that Torah law would be "forgotten" and "nullified" by the use of Levitts' MK and Star-K glatt-kosher fresh meat in Toronto restaurants.

At the end of the day, shchitat chutz and shmerut Shabbat may have been the "right" policy decisions. But this is only the "what" of the matter. We also need to know the why, who, how and when.

The Va'ad serves an important function and trust within the Jewish community. It supervises thousands of kosher products, reacts properly and swiftly when it discovers that a supermarket product bears an unauthorized or inadequate kosher label, and issues immediate notices in this newspaper as well as to dozens of Jewish institutions to warn the public. In this regard, it is constructively responsive to the needs of its constituency.

But the Va'ad should more proactively serve the needs of the community through process as well as substance. It can do this, and at the same time potentially avoid an unfortunate episode such as was the case with Levitts, by being openly accountable to the very public it serves.

Hitler and Eichmann memoirs in the news

The man from Braunau who unleashed the world war that killed 50 million people, six million Jews amongst them, is in the news again. This time it is the book he wrote in the mid-'20s while imprisoned in Germany. Called Mein Kampf (my battle), it is the bible of Nazism and anti-Semitism.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

After the war and the demise of the Fuhrer, the German government prohibited distribution of the book, declaring it as belonging to a class of forbidden materials that were deemed opposed to the German constitution. Clearly, Mein Kampf fell under this rubric and ever since, distribution of the book in Germany has been illegal.

Of course, that kind of law never works completely. There are always loopholes, and today, with the Internet and other means of communication, any German who really wants to read the book will find it possible to do so.

Also, Germany is the only country where it is illegal and since everyone else in the world so inclined can get the book, send it to Germany, leave it in a hotel room or wherever, there is no dearth of this poisonous stuff. The world today is not foolproof, if in fact it ever was.

It is interesting to note that today's largest publisher, Bertelsmann, is a German concern that also owns a majority share in a number of North American publishing companies such as Random House. I am informed that Bertelsmann is trying to persuade its foreign affiliates to dump all copies of Mein Kampf.

It is aided in his endeavor by the Bavarian government which claims ownership rights to the book, for the original copyright passed from Hitler to the Nazi party, and the Bavarian government became the inheritor of its properties. It recently initiated a court case against a Swedish publisher of Mein Kampf, with the result that all Swedish copies had to be destroyed.

By a strange coincidence, the Hitler problem is paralleled by another literary inheritance: the memoir of Adolf Eichmann. The infamous little man who headed the extermination policy of the Nazis was kidnapped by Israeli agents from Argentina where he had sought refuge and, after a widely publicized trial, was convicted of genocide and executed in Jerusalem.

While in prison, he composed a memoir, which is said to be his defence. To this date, the document has not been published, although there is great pressure in Israel to let the public have an insight into the soul of this man.

So far, the government has resisted the request, for it fears Eichmann's notes will feed the maw of Holocaust deniers. However, many Israelis believe that sooner or later the government will have to let the book be published.

More than 50 years have now passed since the end of World War II with its terrifying slaughter. Somehow, it seems, the unspeakable evil of those days still rears its ugly head, as these problems and, worse, the recent Los Angeles murderous rampage, proved all too clearly.

Water crisis coming to a boil

Like the long discussed but still non-existent express train between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, Israeli officials like to pay lip service to the need for water conservation and extensive desalinization. Who can argue?

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

This is, after all, a country that's half desert, home to a growing population with a rising standard of living and where barely a drop of rain falls during the spring and summer.

The taps may not yet be dry but this year's water problems point in that direction. For too long, the usual Israeli reaction to the water situation – as with so many of the country's other ecological time bombs – has been basically not to act until a crisis hits home. The inevitable crisis has now arrived close to our doorstep – and it's not as if we weren't warned.

This year, following one of the worst droughts this century, Israel is facing an acute water shortage. Just how severe the crisis is may be subject to debate among specialists. But there's no escaping that without major innovation the country's limited, increasingly polluted water resources cannot satisfy current needs, let alone future ones.

Try telling that to the general public. To see the way some Israelis continue to hose down their sidewalks and cars and water their gardens with thoughtless abandon is to realize that reality still has not sunk in for many people. How bad does the situation have to become before the country gets really serious about attacking its water problem?

Last month, for the first time, the Water Commission lowered by 30 centimeters the minimum permissible level in Lake Kinneret – Israel's main reservoir of fresh water. Experts say excessive pumping has already made the Kinneret saline, that the country's aquifers are depleted and the quality of drinking water is deteriorating. Environment Minister Dalia Itzik says the situation is worrisome, the result of years of "chronic mismanagement."

In the face of such a water shortage, it defies logic why the government has not launched a nationwide campaign to drastically reduce consumption of fresh water and pulled out the stops on desalinization. Emergencies call for urgent measures such as ordering individuals, municipalities and kibbutzim to check every tap, hose, toilet valve and waterline to eliminate leaks – leaks that can consume nearly half a city's water supply. So far, nothing of the sort seems in the cards – except more talk and the creation of yet another government committee.

In other places bedeviled by drought, governments forbid citizens from watering private gardens and washing their cars. With the added incentive of much reduced water bills, people are told to use water-saving attachments for taps and to take other easy steps like putting a brick in the toilet tank, thereby reducing the volume of the tank and saving up to 50 percent of the water used when flushing. That's no small saving given that toilet tanks account for 40 percent of urban water use.

The water shortage in Israel is not yet felt among the general public because the biggest cut in supplies has been in the agricultural sector, which has suffered a 35 percent reduction. Still, the public must pick up the tab as farmers have been compensated, as required by law, to the tune of 300 million shekels. In contrast, in the urban sector, there have been no cutbacks.

More water woes emerged recently when the Environment Ministry reported that the combination of drought and pollution flow has worsened the condition of the country's rivers and streams, and in some cases the pollution is threatening underground sources of drinking water.

That echoed an earlier report by the State Comptroller who said domestic and industrial sewage, solid waste, fertilizers and pesticides are leaking into the ground and contaminating the water reserves that provide drinking water.

Still, complacency and bureaucratic inertia persist in the government where six ministries have jurisdiction over water-related issues. Last spring, cabinet members refused to provide funding for a major desalinization plan, saying it was too expensive, and besides, what's the panic?

Israel currently consumes some 1.5 billion cubic metres of water a year, more than half of which is used for agriculture. A recent report by Greenpeace predicts that within ten years, Israel will face an annual deficit of at least half of what it consumes every year.

For now, as winter approaches, people pray the skies will open and let loose with 40 days and 40 nights of rain. But it will take far more than a deluge of biblical proportion to solve Israel's long-term water problems.

Washington knows best?

With one year to go before the American elections, and few foreign policy achievements to show for eight years in office, the Clinton Administration and Al Gore need a miracle in the Middle East.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In the negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, the euphoria of the signing ceremony on the White House lawn in September 1993 has long since evaporated. The odds of an agreement in the "permanent status" negotiations within one year are very low.

On the Syria front, the news for Clinton is even bleaker. Absolutely nothing of substance has been accomplished despite dozens of high-level trips to Damascus, and hundreds of hours of talks. Without a miracle, Clinton's historical legacy in the Middle East will be one of failed hopes and inconsistency.

In this atmosphere, there is real concern that Clinton and his Middle East team will become desperate, pressing Israel to make dangerous concessions in an effort for a major success before they leave office. With recent foreign policy debacles in arms control, Pakistan, Russia, and China, there is little left, other than the Middle East, to balance the score-card.

The recent reappointment of Martin Indyk as U.S. ambassador to Israel is a warning sign in this context. Indyk is one of the core members of Clinton's Middle East team, moving from head of the Washington Institute to the government, and serving as U.S. ambassador in Tel Aviv.

However, after openly siding with Shimon Peres and the Labor party in the 1996 election campaign (violating basic diplomatic practice and showing a lack of insight into Israeli conditions), Indyk was not the appropriate representative during the Netanyahu era. Like some other Jewish appointees, Indyk was accused of acting as if he knew more about "what was good for Israel" than Israeli voters and leaders. Indyk then went back to Washington and was active in the tilt towards Arafat.

Now, after Netanyahu has gone and Labor, in some form, is back in power, Indyk is returning to the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv, for one last effort. As a political appointee, he will probably leave government after the U.S. elections.

This could be a dangerous situation for Israel. Signs of desperation from Washington, and pressure on Israel, will be exploited fully by Arafat and Assad.

The Americans are likely to press Israel and the Barak government to make concessions on key issues of security, territory, Jerusalem, refugee claims, water, and Jewish settlements. This formula of one-sided concessions worked (at least for the U.S. and for the Palestinians) during the earlier period after Oslo, and the pattern may be repeated.

Another danger is that the U.S. government will make promises to Israel that it will not be able to keep. The Clinton administration pledged hundreds of millions of dollars in assistance to help offset the costs of moving military bases and adding anti-terrorist defences associated with implementing the Wye and Sharm agreements.

However, the Republican-controlled Congress is waging war with the disgraced President, and has repeatedly blocked foreign aid appropriations. In other words, the American domestic political farce has had a direct impact on the Middle East peace process, and on Israeli security requirements.

In this context, the Barak government has to be careful to insure that outcomes that depend on American pledges are implemented. With respect to Syria, this point is crucial. Any change in Israeli military deployments on the Golan Heights will require new bases and equipment.

Israel also relies heavily on the early warning stations in the area, including the complex on Mt. Hermon, to prevent surprise attacks. If these stations are closed or access is limited, Israel will need U.S. assistance for getting alternative early warning capabilities, including expensive satellite technology. But if the assistance package is caught in the political crossfire of American politics, or becomes another victim of neo-isolationism in Washington, Israel will pay the price.

At the same time, the U.S. remains Israel's only strategic ally and major source of support. Without American leadership, the international sanctions that slow Saddam Hussein's progress in rebuilding his weapons of mass destruction would disappear entirely.

In addition, Washington has been at the forefront of efforts to prevent the fundamentalist government in Iran from accelerating its missile and nuclear programs. These policies are vitally important for Israel, and in the State Department, Martin Indyk has played a major role in developing these policies.

During this transition period in American politics, Barak's challenge is to maintain the positive aspects in the relationship while carefully blocking initiatives that result from personal and political ambition. The Clinton administration's place in history books and Al Gore's election chances should not depend on forcing Israel into one-sided concessions.

The Kirshner File

Portrait of a great philosopher

When Latvian-born Isaiah Berlin (1909-1997) arrived in Britain with his family at the tender age of 11, his English vocabulary consisted of 75 words. For the precocious Berlin, this was not a problem. He mastered English, and as an adult, he was torrentially eloquent.

With his facility for words and his penchant for ideas, Berlin evolved into a renowned philosopher whose works to this day remain fresh and are still avidly read, discussed and analyzed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

An accomplished essayist, Berlin was the author of many books, among them Karl Marx, The Age of Enlightenment and Four Essays on Liberty. And thanks to his assiduous literary trustee, Henry Hardy, Princeton University Press recently published Berlin's unpublished writings, The Roots of Romanticism and Concepts and Categories, which are bound to burnish his reputation as one of the century's most influential philosophers.

Michael Ignatieff, a Toronto writer living in London, has written a superb biography of the man, A Life: Isaiah Berlin (Penguin), a volume which is both a labor of love and a rigorous examination of his persona and career.

The son of a prosperous Russian timber merchant, Berlin launched himself in 1928 when, as a plump young lad, he went up to Oxford with a scholarship to study classics, modern history and philosophy. He was a gifted student, a loquacious and rapid-fire talker and an astonishing cosmopolitan whose quicksilver intelligence and prodigious memory amazed tutors and friends alike. It was not surprising that he was invited to join a circle of the brightest young dons and undergraduates at Oxford.

Upon graduating, Berlin toyed with the idea of becoming a lawyer, but concluded that law would be too dull. He also considered journalism, but when he confessed that writing did not come easily to him, the editor of The Manchester Guardian advised Berlin to look elsewhere.

Returning to academia, Berlin accepted a post as a tutor in philosophy at New College, Oxford. Then, in 1932, he took a fellowship at All Souls, the first Jew ever elected to that select Oxford institution. When the news was announced, The Jewish Chronicle ran an article, the chief rabbi sent him a letter of congratulations and a Rothschild invited him to spend a weekend at his mansion.

All Souls, Ignatieff observes, provided Berlin the setting in which all his characteristics could flourish: his zest for learning, his appetite for conversation and his need for company and gossip. Nevertheless, in 1938, he began teaching at New College, Oxford.

On the eve of World War II, Berlin, who was colloquially known as Shaya, wrote his first book, a treatment of Karl Marx. The book, which is still in print, deepened his loathing of Marxian historical determinism.

Berlin spent much of the war in the United States with the British Press Service and the Ministry of Information in New York City and with the British embassy in Washington. He wrote a study of the Associated Press' reportage of British morale during the 1940 Battle of Britain and then began compiling a weekly synopsis on the state of American public opinion. His job was to get the United States into the war on Britain's side.

As part of his duties, the personable Berlin lobbied newspaper and magazine editors, businessmen, clergymen and politicians. Among the Jewish personalities he met were Felix Frankfurter, the Supreme Court judge; Herbert Lehman, the governor of New York; Arthur Hays Sulzberger, the publisher of The New York Times; Walter Lippmann, the syndicated columnist; and Chaim Weizmann, the Zionist leader.

Isaiah Berlin

Berlin rarely failed to impress his interlocutors. At the end of a lunch, Harold Ross, the editor of The New Yorker, said, "Young man, I can't understand a word you say, but if you write anything, I'll print it."

Berlin eventually tired of the weekly grind of churning out political summaries, and grew depressed working for a government he regarded as pro-Arab. Berlin, a secular Jew, was a Zionist, and paid his first visit to Palestine in 1934.

Ignatieff claims that Berlin's loyalties were tested to the breaking point in 1943. When he heard that Prime Minister Winston Churchill and President Franklin Roosevelt would issue a declaration condemning Zionist agitation in Palestine, he leaked the story to a Manhattan newspaper publisher partial to Zionism. This person informed Henry Morgenthau, the U.S. secretary of the treasury. Morgenthau, in turn, tipped off the Jewish lobby. The United States withdrew its support for the declaration.

At the end of the war, new pressures forced Berlin to choose between his British and Jewish identities. After the Jewish underground bombed the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, which housed the British administration in Palestine, Weizmann consulted Berlin over a speech he intended to deliver at the Zionist Congress in Switzerland.

Berlin contributed a strong paragraph condemning Jewish terror. It read:"Terrorism insults our history; it mocks the ideals for which a Jewish society must stand; it contaminates our banner."

Yet, when Weizmann asked Berlin to be his chief of staff, Berlin demurred. Weizmann was furious. He could not understand how a Jew could prefer to remain in the Diaspora when the fate of the Jewish homeland hung in the balance. Berlin was loath to give up his position at Oxford for the sharply polarized world of Jewish politics. Later, he rejected overtures from David Ben-Gurion and Abba Eban to live in Israel. Not even an offer of the directorship of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs enticed him. "There is irony in all of this," Ignatieff observes. "A life-long Zionist discovering that he had no place in Zion." Berlin's interest in Israeli politics, however, never flagged, and like all liberals, he favored a two-state solution to Israel's dispute with the Palestinians.

In 1950, Berlin, whom Ignatieff describes as a social democrat, wrote his longest and most significant essay to date, Political Ideas in the Twentieth Century, in Foreign Affairs. The piece was a western liberal's defence of freedom against the Soviet threat. Berlin had visited the Soviet Union in 1945, had conferred with such dissidents as Anna Akhmatova and Boris Pasternak and had emerged from that trip with a loathing for Communist tyranny.

Berlin, in 1952, delivered a series of talks for the BBC. With the broadcast of Freedom and its Betrayal, he became a public intellectual. In Ignatieff's view, Berlin's most influential lecture, given at Oxford in 1958, was entitled Two Concepts of Liberty. Throughout the 1960s, he gave guest lectures in the United States, first at Harvard and then at City University of New York.

Despite a frantically busy social life, Berlin was often lonely. He might well have remained a "sexless don" had he not met and fallen in love with Aline Halban, a married French woman whose father was Baron Pierre de Gunzbourg, the scion of the illustrious Russian-Jewish banking family. Berlin courted her, she divorced her husband, and ultimately they were married. By all accounts, they lived happily ever after.

In concluding, Ignatieff singles out Henry Hardy for having had the foresight to ferret out Berlin's scattered body of work from obscure scholarly journals. Ignatieff suggests that if Hardy had not undertaken this important task, Berlin's star might not have shone so brightly in the firmament he brilliantly illuminated.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

A Jewish myth

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Recently, I was involved in the creation and development of a 12-part documentary series about Judaism, which is currently airing on Canadian and American television.

When I reflect on the experience of interviewing Jews from across the religious spectrum, it becomes strongly apparent to me that the concept of "Jewish unity" must be relegated, at this point in our history, to the status of a myth.

The radical split between various factions on many matters relating to Jewish law and belief make it difficult to accord the unity claim even a semblance of truth. The different denominations cannot agree on the most basic of ideas, such as the nature of Revelation, whether adherence to Halachah is binding or voluntary, or the relevance of mitzvot. In many past centuries, Jews experienced some kind of polarization, but the schism is particularly turbulent at present.

The issues are very complex. Rabbi Elliot Dorff, a leader of the Conservative movement, has explained that in a religious context, pluralism "is the position that one can affirm one's own views and practices while being open to communication with, and appreciation of, those who think and act differently."

But as Rabbi Dorff goes on to say, this statement entails serious problems: "How can I justify my own view while granting legitimacy to others? Are there any boundaries to the legitimacy I should extend to others?"

This last question is particularly relevant when applied to Orthodox Judaism. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, once noted: "The concept of Orthodoxy presupposes the possibility of heresy. A community is defined by boundaries. Boundaries may be sharply or loosely defined, but there must exist a territory outside them for them to be boundaries at all. Each of the denominations draws some kind of line, inside of which they believe can be placed a legitimate form of Judaism, but outside of which is beyond the pale."

Rabbi Sacks adds that there "is a collision of consciousness between traditions and modern ways of understanding." The dominant theme of tradition is certainly the secure knowledge that the customs and beliefs of one's parents are there to be continued and not questioned. But the modern sensibility is that there is more than one way to think and act.

For Prof. Arthur Hertzberg, the issue regarding pluralism is that whether one likes it or not, it is a fact, a living reality in Jewish life. It is an inevitability.

But for Rabbi Mayer Schiller, pluralism is simply another word for heresy. His definition of Judaism rests on acceptance of the authority of written and oral law as binding on every Jew. Since the Enlightenment, Rabbi Schiller argues, various movements have begun to deny the authority of these texts, leading to a breakdown in Jewish faith.

The roots of this clash can be traced, of course, to the difficulty of integrating Judaism into modernity.

Rabbi Irving Greenberg argues that the schism currently forming is, paradoxically, an outcome of freedom. Previously, anti-Semitism united Jews. But in an age of comfort and the onset of modernity, Jews turn on one another. In Rabbi Greenberg's words, "Jews cannot handle freedom very well."

Will our children and grandchildren on different sides of the religious fault line be able to talk with and learn from one another? More seriously, will they recognize each other as Jews at all? These questions are deeply troubling and will not succumb to quick solutions. In the meantime, our children grow up in a Jewish world of acrimony and name calling, surely not the best tools that we can offer them in their search for meaning and God.

Rabbis answer on the Web

Today, more rabbis on the Internet who are willing to field your questions and maybe engage in some online debate. A reminder: check out the credentials of the rabbi you are dealing with and direct complicated problems to a reliable authority.

If you have a question about kashrut, Rabbi Chaim Davis may have the answer [http://www.koshersupermarket.com/rabbidavis.htm]. One writer asks whether sushi can be kosher, since fish in its raw state contains "blood." The answer: "Jews have been eating raw fish ever since herring was invented. Although the Torah forbids animal and fowl blood, kosher fish are permitted without removing their blood." Hungry for more? KosherQuest's Rabbi Eliezer Eidlitz may have a solution [http://www.kosherquest.org/html/toc.htm].

What to say when confronted by missionaries? Rabbi Tovia Singer has some answers and welcomes your questions [http://www.outreachjudaism.org/asktherabbi.html]. After my articles appeared earlier this year, I received an e-mail from Baruch Sienna who pointed me to Reb on the Web, run by Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning [http://www.kolel.org/cgi-ubb/Ultimate.cgi?action=intro]. Writes Baruch: "Reb on the Web, has, in my humble opinion, the best ask the rabbi column (with attitude.)" Here are some of the questions the Reb addresses: What's the story with tfillin? Converted, married a Jew, divorced. Now what? Should liberal Jews work at food banks on Shabbat?

Baruch is also Webmaster for clickonJudaism which operates another Ask the Rabbi site [http://www.clickonjudaism.org/pages/askus.html].

One of the oldest and best sites around is Ask the Rabbi [http://www.asktherabbi.org]. This marvelous site is run by several rabbis at Ohr Somayach in Jerusalem who are knowledgeable, sensitive and humorous. No question is too sublime (Why did God create the world?) or practical (According to Jewish law, can you go 65 miles per hour in a 55 mph zone? The answer: Perhaps, but if you get a ticket, that's your problem.)

You can also comb their archives by subject and join the mailing list to get new questions and answers delivered to you weekly. And even if your question isn't chosen to appear on the Ohr Somayach Web site, you will receive a personal reply.

Of all the rabbis that I have (virtually) met through the Web, none has been quite like Rabbi R. Mermelstein [http://www.jpfo.org/askrabbi.htm].

According to his Web site, in addition to his background in rabbinics, Rabbi Mermelstein is on the editorial board of Jews for the Preservation of Firearms Ownership and "is of course, an avid shooter and handloader."

Some sample questions: Should pious Jews own firearms? What are the best handguns for self-defence for a novice? Are Jews allowed to carry weapons outdoors on the Sabbath? (Rabbi Mermelstein's response: Possibly, but consult your local rabbi.)

Rabbinic Reflections

Chesed essential for Jewish continuity

By RABBI RON AIGEN

Continuity has been the buzzword of the '90s in the Jewish world. With all the commissions and innovative programming on "continuity," the question still remains: What is most likely going to ensure a Jewish future for the next generation?

The weekly portion, Chaye Sarah, deals with this theme of continuity in the story of how Abraham concerns himself with securing a burial place for his wife, Sarah, and then ensures that his son, Isaac, will marry the right woman.

In this search for the "right woman," occupying the longest chapter in the book of Genesis, we find a character test devised by Abraham's servant to ensure that the woman he brings back for Isaac will be generous and kind.

What we learn from this is that the tradition of Abraham is not merely defined as a system of beliefs and practices that constitute a "religion." In the perpetuation of Abraham's tradition, the core concern is the creation of a way of life, a culture and a community of people with a shared set of values.

In searching for a woman who will offer water to his camels and himself, Eleazer asks God for "signs" that are not magical or supernatural, but rather indications of human characteristics that are a natural part of seeking human fulfilment.

The key words found in reference to Rebecca, the prospective bride, are the same terms applied earlier to Abraham: native land, father's house, going to the land, blessing, and becoming great. The crucial verb, "to go," occurs seven times in connection with Rebecca, thus signalling the importance of this term.

The Jewish way to go – Halachah – eventually becomes a rabbinic system of dos and don'ts. But what is most striking in this biblical narrative is that we find none of those criteria expected by the Halachah for being a good Jewish wife. There is no mention of the many mitzvot we would think of today as necessary for Jewish continuity. Instead, the servant sought out for Isaac a woman who would be kind and hospitable.

There is more at issue here, however, than simply being nice. Surely Jewish continuity must depend upon something more than just being a nice person.

The quality Eleazer was looking for was chesed – the quality of devotion to another, the attitude toward life that asks, "What can I give you?" rather than "What do I need from you?" Chesed connotes a gift of unexpected kindness, an act of grace. It is covenant-love – the devotion to something that transcends oneself.

This quality is an amazing gift, the gift of unexpected kindness. And indeed, we find that when Eleazer receives that kindness from Rebecca, "the man was astonished" – veha'ish mishta'eah lah, Rashi tells us, he was "transfixed," "devastated," "confused," "struck-dumb," "not sure whether God had made his errand successful or not."

How can we ever be sure? Our quest for success in life – whether as Jews or as human beings in general – can never be guaranteed or known in advance. Nor will all the rules and dogmas we might devise guarantee success. To be sure, if we seek Jewish continuity, we must find a particular Jewish map for making our way in life that distinguishes us from other people in the world who may also be good, kind or nice people. But what we also learn from Abraham's servant is that we cannot even begin to set out on this Jewish journey if we have not looked deep within for a special kind of openness to being human – an openness that allows us to respond with chesed, the gift of loving devotion to the tradition of Abraham.

Perhaps it is the nature of chesed that is essential to understanding our quest for the future of Judaism. Chesed is something that cannot be demanded or engineered. It can only be given freely of one's own will – as a gift. Jewish life cannot be engineered by governments or willed by rabbis or parents; it can only be chosen freely by those who are open to it – those who come to it with an attitude of chesed.

Zionist-Arab conflict

Righteous Victims – A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict 1881-1999*, by Benny Morris (Random House of Canada, $62).

Books
Bernard Baskin

Are we our own worst enemies? Why is it that a group of Israeli writers, academics, intellectuals and artists are busily engaged in derogating their own country? Israel's cause, they argue, is not just; the State, established in 1948, was "born in sin."

Post-Zionism, as this unfortunate trend is called, is in the process of rewriting Zionist history in favor of its relentless adversaries and foes.

Some years ago, Nathan Alterman, the esteemed Israeli poet wrote a short poem which contained an ominous prophecy. "Then did Satan say: 'How will I conquer this beleaguered one? He possesses courage, ingenuity, resourcefulness and tools of war.' And then he said: 'I'll not rob his strength, nor bridle him, nor rein him in, nor enervate his hand. But this I'll do – blunt his mind, till he forgets his cause is just.'"

Israeli post-Zionist historians insist that the solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict based on simple territorial compromises cannot make Israel moral. This, they say, is because modern Jewish nationalism did not create (as Zionist ideology claims) a beneficent and well-meaning progressive national movement, but rather a colonialist, racist, and evil one.

Actually, such calumny is not new: the doctrine that Zionism is a colonialist movement exploiting and enslaving Arab peasants was formulated and disseminated in Soviet propaganda organs embellished with "scientific" terms from the Marxist-Leninist lexicon.

Benny Morris, professor of history at Ben-Gurion University, is perhaps Israel's leading post-Zionist historian. The book under review is a well-written, comprehensive account of the military and diplomatic aspects of the Arab-Israel conflict – and also purports to debunk some of his country's most cherished ideas.

Concerning Israel's War of Independence, for example, he notes that, contrary to popular belief, the fledgling nation enjoyed clear military and strategic superiority. He writes that during the period between the two world wars, the Jews in Palestine lived under "the protective carapace of British rifles and under a beneficent and efficient administration that made the tasks of the settlers and their Jewish Agency infinitely easier." That conclusion will come as a surprise to those who suffered under the British rule.

While relating Israeli human-rights violations and atrocities against Arabs, Morris also omits corresponding Palestinian and other Arab acts. Thus, there is almost no mention of the fact that, during the Jordanian occupation of the old city of Jerusalem, all synagogues and other Jewish holy sites were desecrated.

Morris points out that after 1967, any resistance to Israeli rule met with quick and brutal repression.

Only the intifadah, which started in December 1987, at last propelled the Israeli leadership toward moderation and concessions. He concludes that in the long run, "the only language that either side has understood in this conflict is force."

The Israelis, of course, did make mistakes and cause injustices, but in fact there has never been another national liberation movement in history which so strove to attain its goals without violence, so endeavored to guide its steps by moral principles.

As every historian knows, there are no objective statistics; even the ostensible appearance of truth is tendentious. All historians select from that "pile of detritus of past facts" that suits their object, obscuring the remainder. A history of World War II could be written focusing on the suffering of Germans from Allied bombings and invasions – all based on facts. All one need do is distort proportions.

In a recent article entitled Has Israel Lost its Nerve, Norman Podhoretz warns of a crisis that may one day confront Israel. "I hope and trust that the Israeli fighting spirit can and will come roaring back at that moment. But instead of being encouraged and cultivated as in the past, it will have to resurrect itself in the teeth of a culture full of the self-hatred that the early theories of Zionism mistakenly believed would be purged by statehood from the Jewish soul." The Jewish people have been given a state, if they can keep it.

'Does Judaism want me?'

Decision to convert overwhelming

Freelance journalist Marlane Smith begins a series of articles on her personal experiences about converting to Judaism. She lives in Vancouver and is engaged to be married to a Jewish man in August 2000.

By MARLANE SMITH
Special to The CJN

I will never forget the conversation I had with a rabbi soon after I made the decision to convert to Judaism.

I served him and his wife breakfast in my restaurant. Don't ask me how we got onto the topic of my conversion, but he had an incredible impact on me. I don't usually have such a meaningful, memorable conversation before 8 a.m. Perhaps that's why his words have been so lasting.

He told me Judaism is fortunate to have someone like me who is enthusiastic and fascinated about committing to become a Jew.

Flippantly, I asked him if Judaism is lucky because it is gaining a Jew in me or because it isn't losing one in my Jewish partner. He chuckled and took a sip of his decaffeinated non-fat latte, as I held my breath, afraid that I offended him.

An interesting question, he mused, and dove into his cholesterol-free omelet. My breakfast-serving tact kicked in and I left him in mid-chew.

Unfortunately, I never received an answer. Eighteen months later, I'm still pondering his comment and many larger questions: Does Judaism even want me? Will I ever truly identify as Jewish?

When I agreed to convert, I could not have imagined how overwhelmed I would feel. I did not take the decision lightly, but I never thought it would make me so confused.

Guest Voices

I was not raised with any religious teachings. My mother is a Catholic who refused to bring my sister and me up in the same strict religious environment in which she was raised; my father is a non-practising Protestant. If anything, I thought it would be easy to convert, since I had no religion to abandon.

And it's not as though I made a hasty decision, found a suitable synagogue and rabbi, and started the process immediately after deciding to convert.

My fiance and I just returned from a one-year trip around the world. We've both had plenty of time to discuss and think. Easy. Hah! What an over-simplification!

In the two weeks since my initial meeting with the rabbi my fiance and I have chosen to work with, I've been in tears during the Shabbat candlelighting and davening, and then again following one of my meetings with our wonderful rabbi at Or Shalom synagogue.

Fortunately, I have enrolled in an immersion and conversion class with some people who identify as Jews, some who identify as non-Jews – and some who feel they are halfway in between, like me.

As we went around the circle introducing ourselves, a Jewish man divulged that he had cried bittersweet tears during his first prayers many years after he had renounced God and religion.

His experience gives me great hope and relief. It reaffirms that I'm not alone in this overwhelmingness. I have no idea why I cry (and I write that in the present because it is ongoing), but I know they aren't tears of sadness. I'm confident that I will soon have a better understanding of where they originate.

My paternal great-grandmother was Jewish. Could my tears be through her?

I've read that in the Bible, when the Israelites were given the Torah, their response was: "We shall do and we shall hear." In other words, they promised to act first and hear or understand second. To leap before looking. I feel that's what I'm doing.

I still don't have the answer to the question I asked the rabbi nearly two years ago, but perhaps I don't need it articulated by him.

The answer to most of my questions and initial doubts are within me. Eventually they will surface. For now, I'll just continue leaping.

Education conference planned

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish education in the coming thousand years will be the theme of the 16th annual Board of Jewish Education conference of the Association of Jewish Day School Administrators and Principals.

The conference, titled From Text to Technology: The Challenges Facing Jewish Educators in the Sixth Millennium, will be held at Blue Mountain Resort in Collingwood from Nov. 12 to 14.

Zita Gardner, principal of Leo Baeck Day School, and co-chair of the event along with Michelle Lynn of Holy Blossom Religious School and Faigie Davids, executive director of She'arim Hebrew Day School, called the weekend "an opportunity for educators and administrators to be together over Shabbat, to socialize, learn and pray with each other."

Guest speakers will be Seymour Epstein, new director of the Board of Jewish Education, and Susan Jackson, director of continuity for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The program will include workshops and lectures, opportunities for informal discussions, and a Klezmer on the Mountain concert after Shabbat.

The Board of Jewish Education is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. For more information, call 633-7770.

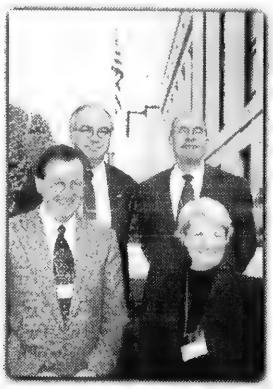
Washington Greets Record UJA Federation Delegation

Getting up at 4 am for 18 hours of non-stop activity is not the way most people plan time off work. But 128 UJA Federation supporters - a record turn out - participated last week in a whirlwind pre-dawn to pre-midnight day on UJA's Washington Fly-In. The trip took delegates to the Canadian Embassy, Capitol Hill, the State Department, FBI Headquarters and the Holocaust Memorial Museum.



Israel and the peace process dominated briefings by diplomatic personnel. Jon Allen, a Canadian Embassy Middle East specialist conceded that Canada, Israel and the United States don't always see eye-to-eye on Middle East policy.

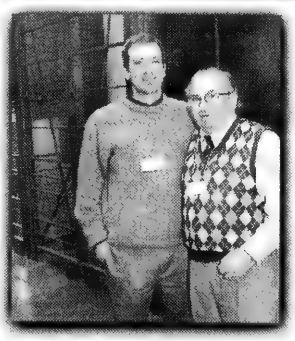
"We don't accept everything that Israel does simply because it has the right to exist," he said. He noted, though, that Canadian-Israeli relations are warmer with Ehud Barak's election as Israel's Prime Minister.

Jake Walles, who heads the U.S. State Department's Office of Israel and Arab-Israeli Affairs, offered praise for Jordan's new king, Abdullah. "He can not only make tough decisions, but he can make them happen," said Walles referring to Abdullah's decision to close down Hamas facilities in Jordan.

David Gillete, senior lobbyist for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, claimed that Barak's commitment to leave Lebanon in a year has thrown Syrian President Hafez Assad "into a tizzy." Assad, he said, will no longer be able to use attacks on Israeli troops as a bargaining tool to get back the Golan Heights.

Many Fly-In participants came especially to see the Holocaust Museum, which welcomes 2.4 million visitors a year – 96% of whom are non-Jewish.

Auschwitz survivor Max Moneta, who has visited the museum twice before, brought his son Fred for the first time. "It's overwhelming," said Fred. "I've seen these images before but the accumulated impact is overpowering. When I come here, I can't believe that we lived through it," added his father Max.



"To see what man does to man while the world stood by watching and did nothing is particularly overwhelming," observed Walter Moodie, representing the Royal Bank, a UJA Federation corporate partner.

And, at the end of a seemingly endless day, the atmosphere among participants was surprisingly fresh and certainly upbeat. "It's a great way for people with a common cause to get together," said an enthusiastic Joel Flatt. "You really see how strong a community we are by being here."

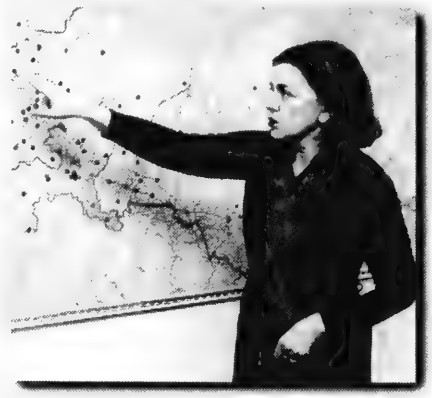
Dramatic Increase in Aliyah

Jews from the former Soviet Union are fleeing to Israel at an astonishing rate.

A recent special report on aliyah released by the Jewish Agency reveals that the number of Jews immigrating from the FSU is expected to reach 65,000 by the end of the year – a 20% rise from earlier forecasts.



Alla Levy, Head of Jewish Agency operations in the former Soviet Union, indicates the areas in which the largest concentration of Jews is still located. Levy will speak about a new wave of aliyah at the UJA Federation Major Gifts dinner in Toronto later this month.

Between January and September alone over 44,000 FSU Jews were brought to Israel, representing a 40% climb over the same period last year.

The most dramatic increase comes from Russia, where economic devastation and rising anti-Semitic incidents have driven 21,000 Jews to aliyah in the last 6 months – an increase of 130% over the same period last year.

According to the Jewish Agency, funded by the worldwide UJA Federation network, immigration from Russia alone, during 1999, may exceed 33,000, if present trends continue

UJA Federation funds, designated for overseas use, are directed to the Jewish Agency for, among other things, the transportation and re-settlement of Jewish immigrants in Israel.

Hot Talking Hollis

Women's sexuality, food and body image were the steamy topics at the Hot and Heavy Evening For Women, sponsored by UJA Federation's Women's Campaign and Jewish Women's Federation. More than 450 women heard psychologist and well-known author Dr. Judi Hollis talk about issues with which women struggle related to their spiritual and physical well-being. Hollis, who has published several books and articles on various addictions, is about release her fourth book entitled "Bagels to Buddah." The event was co-chaired by Lori Disenhouse and Ingrid Kay.

Beit Halochem members display their art works

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Creative arts can be one of the main rehabilitation methods used to help people with disabilities.

"Through art, the disabled can explore unknown talents, gain insight into themselves and realize a sense of self-esteem," says Toby Feldberg, president of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada.

An art show of works by members of Beit Halochem in Israel is on exhibit at Holy Blossom Temple to Nov. 15.

"Beit Halochem is the sports, rehabilitation and social centre for Israel's 48,000 disabled veterans and their families. Four Beit Halochem centres in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa and Nahariya offer a wide variety of sports, social and creative programs geared to individual disabilities," Feldberg says.

She notes that bringing the art works to Toronto is just one of the ways the organization became acquainted with these Israeli heroes.

"When you view their accomplishments and read their biographies, you will be able to relate more clearly to them as individuals."

The exhibition includes paintings, drawings, silver jewelry and ornaments created by more than 30 disabled veterans – on display and for sale. The proceeds from the art sales will be used for much needed equipment in the Beit Halochem centres.

The disabled veterans are both male and female. Their art work is done using a variety of mediums and styles – oils, charcoal, acrylic, watercolor, pastel and crayon.

Yosi Arditi, one of the artists in the show, was severely injured by a molotov cocktail in Gaza in 1988 and suffered severe burns over his body. He was hospitalized for 10 months and had countless plastic surgery operations.

He visited the Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv for physiotherapy and learned about the other activities at the centre.

He liked the art program, which, with the support of family and friends, helped him learn to accept his fate and rise to the task of his own rehabilitation.

He has been painting at Beit Halochem for several years, where he is known as a poet and artist.

For more information on the art show, call Beit Halochem, 416-787-8950 or toll free, 1-800-355-1648.

Ezrath Nashim honors Schachter for medical work

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter has received numerous awards for her outstanding contributions to medicine, to her community, and to the rights of women.

At a recent Gala Benefit Concert at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, Schachter was presented with one more award, the International Award of Science by the Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital.

She was honored for her many years of service in both practice and research, and for her advocacy in women's health.

Speaking of the honoree, Dr. Dorothy Pullan said that friends, family, and colleagues have been "touched by the depth of her compassion – Ricky has an intuitive sense of caring and nurturing that goes beyond the ordinary scope of medicine and friendship. To know her is to be inspired by her and to love her."

Schachter has been a dermatologist at Women's College Hospital since 1945 and has served as medical director of the hospital's Psoriasis Education and Research Centre since 1976.

In 1991, through the efforts of patients, friends and with government support, a world class dermatology centre was developed and named after her at Women's College Hospital.

In 1998, in recognition of her contribution to her community, she was awarded the country's highest honor, the Order of Canada.

Renee Rubinstein, president of Canadian Friends of Ezrath Nashim-Herzog Hospital made the presentation to Schachter, who was accompanied by her husband of 57 years, Dr. Benjamin Schachter, a retired biochemist.

Rubinstein said the award was for Schachter's "outstanding lifelong contribution to the science and art of medicine," adding "and for giving to people with all of her heart."

Born and raised in Melville, Saskatchewan, Schachter said that her parents were deeply committed to Israel, and that her mother believed that every woman should have a skill.

Dr. Ricky Kanee Schacter

She gained acceptance to medical school, and received her medical degree from the University of Toronto. She married in her 4th year of medicine.

Schachter told The CJN that when she was an intern a young baby died of an infectious disease of the skin.

There were very few antibiotics in 1943, and that piqued her interest in skin diseases.

"I was fortunate enough to come into medicine at a time when there were major discoveries in medicine.

"I stress the fact that dermatology was cutaneous medicine which reflects the physical, mental and emotional well being of the patient."

She said that her life has been "an uphill move. If I was unsuccessful, I'd step back and develop a new strategy to achieve the goals – I'd never give up."

The funds raised at the Gala Concert, part of an ongoing campaign, will establish a Unit for the Enhancement of Healing in Schachter's name at Ezrath-Nashim. The unit will include an osteoporosis clinic, a comprehensive wound care unit and a research department to strengthen overall treatment of osteoporosis and pressure sores.

The Ezrath Nashim hospital, founded in 1895 by a group of women concerned about emotionally ill people in Jerusalem, is currently a leading institution serving the geriatric and psychiatric population of Greater Jerusalem.

The hospital is recognized worldwide for its research in Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease, and major psychiatric disorders.

Pullan said that it was fitting that Schachter, who dedicated her life personally and professionally to the needs of women, "should more than 100 years after its founding by women be recognized by this fine hospital."

The Gala Concert featured international performers, harpist Erica Goodman, flutist Susan Hoeppner, and pianist Halida Dinova.

The concert was produced by Srul Irving Glick whose Sonata for Flute and Piano was performed by Hoeppner, accompanied by Lydia Wong. Concert chair was Beverly Minuk.

Being a 'good Israeli citizen' important for Ethiopian olah

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — To thousands of Ethiopian Jews, Micha Feldman, consul and director of the Jewish Agency mission in Ethiopia, is known simply as "Aba."

Among those who think of him as a paternal figure is Mehereta Baruch, a 19-year-old Haifa University student who represents the story of successful Ethiopian aliyah.

Feldman, 56, and Baruch spoke at a recent UJA Federation Women's Campaign Lion of Judah luncheon, held at the home of Rosalie Sharp.

As a child, Baruch lived in a small Jewish village in Ethiopia, with no running water and no electricity. "My neighbors were the cows and the sheep," she said.

Fulfilling a dream nurtured over generations, Baruch's father prepared to leave for Jerusalem with most of his family. Mehereta's mother did not join them until later, having remained in Ethiopia to care for her parents.

Travelling in a group of about 50 people, Mehereta and her family began a dangerous, arduous trek that took them to a Red Cross refugee camp in Sudan.

An older sister who had been ill was the first to be allowed to go to Israel, along with Mehereta, then 10, and a younger sister.

They were taken to a Youth Aliyah boarding school, where Baruch was surprised to see that her classmates were all white-skinned. "I thought everyone is like me," she said, smiling. "Of course, they were surprised too."

She quickly adapted to modern life and became a good student, but she worried about her family and prayed for their safe arrival in Israel.

Her prayers were answered with the arrival of her father and brothers, and later, her mother.

Around the time the Baruchs were adjusting to their new life in Israel, Feldman was involved in what was to become a Jewish exodus from Ethiopia.

Operation Solomon, in 1991, involved "a lot of miracles," Feldman said. Although 20,000 people, all desperate to leave, descended on the Israeli consulate in Addis Ababa, nobody was hurt, he said. Over 14,000 were transported to Israel in one weekend.

There are now 70,000 Ethiopian Jews living in Israel.

Despite Baruch's successful integration, she believes it will take "a huge effort to make Ethiopian immigrants an integrated part of Israeli society – from [Ethiopians], from Israeli society, and from Jewish communities all over the world."

She thanked campaign supporters for helping her.

Feldman echoed her thanks, adding that their support made them part of "history-making."

In an interview, Baruch noted that there are now about 2,000 Ethiopian university and college students in Israel. As recently as four years ago, there were only a few hundred, she said.

She attributes her success in part to having learned to integrate her Ethiopian and Israeli identities. At first, she wanted to speak only Hebrew, not Amharic, and to discard Ethiopian traditions. "It took some time until I realized these two have to come together."

Now she is working on a master's degree and collaborating with Israeli writer Smadar Shir on a play based on her own story. "The main idea is to tell Israelis about our heritage. I also want the Ethiopian youth to feel proud and comfortable with their heritage," she said.

Her sister, who works for the Israeli telephone company Bezeq, deals with corporate clients, who sometimes ask her co-workers whether she really knows what to do.

"Some people think we come out of the jungle, that we cannot do many things," said Baruch. Another sister is completing studies to become an auditor.

Baruch hopes that sharing the rich heritage of Ethiopian Jews with Israelis will promote greater understanding.

It's a bigger adjustment for the older generation, she said, noting their frequent loss of status at home – in Ethiopia, a child wouldn't say no to a parent, for example – and in the community, where it is difficult to find or keep a job comparable to what they did before.

"Our parents need the help the government and the Jewish Agency gives, and I needed it," she said. "Now I can be a good Israeli citizen."

Jewish cemetery vandalized

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Police are investigating the desecration of a Jewish cemetery, discovered on Halloween.

Six tombstones and a Holocaust memorial at the Lambton Mills Cemetery on Royal York Road were sprayed with anti-Semitic graffiti some time between last Wednesday and Sunday, said Detective-Sergeant Dave Landry of Metropolitan Toronto Police, 22 Division.

The monument to the people of Ostrowiec, Poland, who perished in the Holocaust, dates back to 1965.

"We have never had any problems out there in all the years," said Albert Speisman, president of the Ostrovtzer Society.

This desecration was "particularly bad," said Keith Landy, chair, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, referring to the viciousness of the words including "Die Burn Pigs" written in light blue paint.

Landy also noted the timing of the vandalism, prior to Halloween, "a time when neo-Nazis tend to express their views.

"It's also tied in to the beginning of Holocaust Education Week, when these issues are in the papers."

The act is not just a desecration, said Landy. "It's an outrage to all fair-minded communities."

Yiddish group gathers for shmooze and schnapps

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — Step into the board room of the Borochov Centre, the weekly venue of the Jewish culture circle, and you enter a time warp.

The Tuesday morning meeting harkens back to another era, when Yiddish was a language spoken by many and discussions about Yiddish literature were commonplace.

On this day, some 40 people – men significantly outnumber women – sit around the long table drinking coffee or tea, munching biscuits, and chattering in Yiddish. Most of the participants are elderly immigrants (the oldest is 102).

The president of the club, Jay Lipsey, a sprightly 94-year-old, turns on the microphone and brings the meeting to order. Minutes of the previous meeting – a highly detailed report – are read. Some people drink a l'chaim courtesy of a member who has recently returned from Israel.

The meeting is essentially a series of presentations by members. On this day, the cultural fare includes the recital of poetry, some musical performances and the reading of three short stories. One turns out to be a rather lengthy tale, and some members have difficulty hiding their irritation. They want time left for other presenters.

The topics are wide-ranging: one man reads a poem about the last day of the British Mandate in Israel; another reads a story by Shalom Aleichem about Lag b'Omer; a third man reads about the emotional impact of the Holocaust; and a woman reads a poem about a Yiddishe mama.

People read works by famous Jewish writers like I.L. Peretz and Sholem Asch or they may choose to showcase their own work. Toronto-based poet Simcha Simchovitch, also a regular in the group, reads some of his Yiddish poems.

Lipsey, who has been president for the last 10 years, deftly leads the group with good humor. After the meeting, he listens patiently to requests. And of course there are complaints, and on this day, he gets an earful.

Presentation times are booked weeks in advance, and there is no shortage of volunteers, he says with a smile, noting that many members enjoy being in the limelight and that he does his best to accommodate everybody.

Jay Lipsey

The format of the meetings has changed over the years, Lipsey explains. About 15 years ago it was essentially a Yiddish discussion group, which drew about a dozen participants.

But he stresses that in recent years, the focus of the meetings has become more educational and attendance has increased.

"We're more than a discussion group. We're teaching here."

Lipsey, who completed an honors BA in political science at York University in 1992, says when he initially joined the club he was asked to teach, and he gave lectures on history and Jewish philosophy.

And while he still gives lectures – like everyone else he waits his turn – members seem to prefer the current participatory format, he says.

Lipsey notes with pride that the group now has about 150 names on the membership list. (Meetings continue through mid-December and resume in March after the winter hiatus in January and February.)

Organizing the group's weekly programs, lecturing, balancing the members' requests and dealing with their complaints is work, but it's worth the effort, Lipsey says.

"My wage is the spiritual satisfaction that people are learning."

Former Israel ambassador addresses BAYT dinner

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Israelis are asked what they want from the peace process, they will answer "peace;" when the Palestinians or Arab states are asked the same question, they will reply, "A Palestinian state, with Jerusalem as its capital," says Dore Gold, outgoing Israel ambassador to the United Nations.

The guest speaker at the 18th anniversary dinner of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation, Gold said that Israel must be just as clear and just as concrete in its goals as the Palestinians if it is to be taken seriously and be successful in getting its point across.

"Israel's goal is to have secure and defensible borders, and to have Jerusalem as its undivided capital," he said.

The status of Jerusalem is a matter of national consensus, Gold said in an interview with The CJN. "No Israeli government will make concessions over that."

The Palestinians have succeeded in persuading Israeli and American Jews that a Palestinian state is inevitable, he said. "Israel must be just as effective in getting its view accepted."

It is essential, he said, that Jews pull together. "That is when we are strong."

Israel's status at the peace conferences will improve if it is accepted into a regional group, which will make it eligible for nomination to key UN bodies, such as the Security Council, said Gold. Currently, it is the only member of the UN not in a regional group.

While geographically, Israel should be in the Asian regional group, Iran and Iraq have adamantly objected to its admittance. Its attempts to be accepted into the regional group for western European countries and other governments, appear to have a better chance since France withdrew its objections last month. (While all the countries in a regional group do not have to support the admittance of another country, no state must actively object.)

When Arab states sense that Israel is isolated internationally, their positions harden, Gold said. "If they sense that Israel has broad backing, that can only improve the negotiating climate."

Dore Gold

At the moment, the principal difficulties in being accepted into the western Europe group come from the European Union, Gold said. Israel is counting on support from Australia, New Zealand and Canada, he said.

The whole issue has to do with the fact that the United Nations is violating its own charter, he said. "There is the principle of sovereign equality in the UN charter. If one country is excluded [from full participation], then there is no sovereign equality."

Gold considers it "intolerable that Israel is expected to make concessions on one hand and at the same time face renewed efforts [by Arab countries] to impose boycotts. We can't accept that kind of duality."

The increasingly vocal lobbying efforts by Palestinian lobbyists in Washington is not so much of a concern as it might be, if Jews pull together, Gold said.

"What is critical is not whether the Palestinians open an office in Washington, but how we as Jews work together. If we pull in different directions, we are weak, and they [Palestinians and their supporters] can be successful."

Gold pointed out at the dinner that the most critical issues in the peace negotiations – water, the status of Jerusalem, and the need for secure borders – are being addressed at a time when the Middle East is a less secure place, not only militarily but diplomatically as well.

"Just because the Cold War has ended, the threat to Israel has not ended," and Israel needs the same dedication and solidarity that previous generations provided, Gold said,

"Stand by us in this critical time," Gold promised, "and we in the State of Israel will stand by you."

More than 700 people filled the banquet hall of Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation (BAYT) in Thornhill to celebrate the synagogue's 18th anniversary.

To mark the occasion, the shul honored two of its members, Larry and Sue Zeifman, and presented the first BAYT Community Leadership Award to Lorna Jackson, mayor of the city of Vaughan.

The evening was a conscious tribute to the vision and dreams of Joseph Tanenbaum, who orchestrated a community in what was then the wilds of Thornhill, with affordable housing, a shul, shopping centre, community centre, library and schools.

The Zeifmans initiated at the dinner the BAYT/Israel Matching Scholarship Fund, which will enable young people from 15 to 25, who have had three years or less of full-time Jewish education to participate in an educational program in Israel.

The evening was a nostalgic retrospective of the history of the shul, from its first days in the basement of the rabbi's house, to its years in a house converted to a shul, complete with a women's gallery, Aron Kodesh, kitchen and social hall, and finally its move to its present location on Clark Avenue.

Photographs and slides showed early picnics and Purim parties (complete with Rabbi Taub enthusiastically playing the drums), Torah dedications and sisterhood programs. Those attending, many of them from the founding families in the shul, cheerfully pointed out people they remembered.

Guests included members of Vaughan and York Region councils and staff, local MP Elinor Caplan and MPPs Al Palladini and Tina Molinari, Israel Consul General Jehudi Kinar and Yesha representative Yaakov Katz, known as Ketzele.

Survivor returns to Poland to help honor savior

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "I owe them my life," says Anita Ekstein of the Polish family that rescued her from certain death during World War II. So, Ekstein figured, one way to make good on a debt that cannot possibly be repaid is to have the family installed in the rarefied company of other Righteous Among the Nations.

That's why Ekstein, a well-known local Holocaust educator and volunteer, along with her husband, son, daughter-in-law and two granddaughters, flew to Warsaw recently to take part in an emotional ceremony at Israel's Embassy that paid tribute to the family and awarded them a specially struck medal on behalf of the government and Yad Vashem.

Honored as Righteous were Amelia Mlot, 76, and posthumously, her parents, Josef and Paulina Matusiewicz. The family hid a young Ekstein in their home in Nazi-occupied Poland.

Born in the city of Lwow, now in Ukraine, Ekstein and her parents were deported to the Jewish ghetto in Skole in 1941. Ekstein was just eight years old.

Her father was put to work as a slave, and he met Josef Matusiewicz, a forced laborer who had been brought in to repair a railway bridge. Ekstein's father made a passionate plea to the Polish Catholic to save his little girl.

By this time, Nazi troops had plucked Ekstein's mother off the streets of the ghetto, and she was never heard from again.

The family took Ekstein in, but after a few months, a suspicious neighbor betrayed her as a Jew, and before the local militia could come, the little girl was literally pushed out a window by the daughter, Amelia, 10 years her senior.

Ekstein hid in an outhouse before re-joining her father, by then, in a labor camp. There, she hid in a large wardrobe for seven weeks, all day, every day.

The Matusiewicz family then arranged for Ekstein to be hidden by their nephew, a priest, near Tarnopol, further east, where she cried herself to sleep every night. The young girl was then shipped back to the family, who explained that they had taken in an orphaned niece.

To avoid suspicion, Ekstein was not allowed to leave the house by herself, and was drilled in Catholicism. The young girl was baptized, taken to mass and given false papers identifying her as Anna Jaworska.

When the family was repatriated to Poland after the war, young Anita went along, and she stayed with them until 1946.

"They fed me, they clothed me. They saved me," says Ekstein, who came to Canada in 1948 in the care of an aunt. She lost 35 members of her family, including both parents.

Ekstein stayed in touch with the family over the years. The two exchanged frequent letters and visits.

To cap off an emotionally charged trip, Ekstein also returned to Ukraine, to the site of the labor camp where her father had been interned.

There, in a building that's now a post office, she discovered the wooden wardrobe in which she had hidden during the daylight hours for seven weeks.

"I lost it," she admits. "My son opened the door, and I just ran."

THE TORONTO JEWISH HEALING PROJECT

The purpose of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

The Toronto Jewish Community has recognized that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and healing through the study of sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories

"Al Tifrosh Min Hatzibur-
Do not separate yourself from the community."
is never more important than at a time of illness.

Jewish tradition recognizes that, though there is never less to healing than what medical science is capable of, there is more to "healing" than what medicine offers.

The Toronto Jewish Healing Project is not affiliated with any stream of Judaism. It focuses on addressing human needs through the lens that Judaism can offer.

Reprimand removed from teacher for Pesach absence

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Jewish teacher who was reprimanded for taking a day off to prepare for Passover has had the reprimand removed from her file.

Lisa Wolfman was also awarded a day's pay, which she expected to lose for having taken off March 31 to prepare for Passover seders.

Teachers are currently allowed five days off a year for religious observance.

Wolfman believes the reversal in her case opens the door for Jewish teachers and school staff to take additional days off, at their discretion, for religious observance and preparation.

The removal of the reprimand also averts a grievance against the school board, which Wolfman was willing to file.

Wolfman's woes began last spring, when she informed her principal in writing that she needed to take March 31, the day of erev Pesach, off to help prepare for two large seders. She volunteered to lose a day's pay.

Wolfman, who has been teaching for 18 years, explained the religious significance of the seders and how much work is involved in their preparation.

But her principal turned her down, saying that the day before Passover is not a religious holiday.

When Wolfman took the day off anyway, she returned to a formal reprimand, something that can damage a teacher's reputation and chances for advancement.

She then launched a complaint, explaining that Passover begins at sundown, and that a seder is an elaborate ritual, not just a meal. Wolfman also pointed out how much work is involved in housecleaning and changing of dishes. She had letters of support from two Toronto rabbis.

In May, a panel upheld the reprimand as justified.

But last month, York Region Board of Education superintendent Diane Finlay lifted the reprimand from Wolfman's file.

The CJN's repeated attempts to reach Finlay were unsuccessful.

"I'm very happy," Wolfman, a Grade 8 teacher at German Mills Public School in Thornhill, told The CJN. "My job is to teach children."

Puppets help kids relate

Puppets in the Kids on the Block troupe answer kids' questions about people who have disabilities or are otherwise different from the majority. Shown with the puppets are some puppeteers from National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section.

TORONTO — Eveline Berger spent 10 years acting like a kid.

Berger, a member of The National Council of Jewish Women Toronto Section (NCJW), was a puppeteer for The Kids on the Block, Inc., a troupe of disabled and non-disabled puppets who travel across the Greater Toronto Area performing at no charge for school-age children.

Although NCJW volunteers no longer perform for The Kids on the Block, Inc., an American-based organization, the organization is still one of the sponsors of the troupe that travels across the city. "This group of nearly life-size puppets tackles everyday problems. There are puppets who are blind, deaf, developmentally disabled – problems that face any kid on the block," says Berger.

She was one of the volunteers trained in bun-raku – a type of Japanese puppetry in which the puppeteer stands behind the puppet – when NCJW decided to be one of the pilots of the project in Toronto in 1984.

"There is a five-minute skit, and at the end of that skit, kids in the audience realize that everyone has differences. Afterwards, the puppets answer any questions the kids have. It is wonderful to see how well the kids respond to the puppets."

Kids on the Block, Inc. was developed in 1977, said Berger, as a direct response to a U.S. law which gave disabled children the opportunity to be educated in regular schools and regular classrooms. As the children became part of the classroom, questions would arise, she said.

"Somehow, the kids feel free to talk to the puppets; they ask them questions they may not ask an adult. It's rewarding to the puppeteer when they realize they've reached a child," she said.

When a group orders a Kids on the Block, Inc. program it receives a puppet with a biographical sketch and background information on the disability or difference; a script; sample questions that children have asked; follow-up discussion topics; and resource material.

Puppets include Joanne and Natalie who have AIDS; Jason and Scott who have asthma; Renaldo (Berger's character) and Brenda who are visually impaired; Lynne and Melodie who have suffered severe burns; and Christine and Joanne who are diabetic. "The puppeteers become attached to their character. They're realistic and loveable," said Berger.

Holocaust centre planning to expand resource area

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation is one step closer to its goal of expanding the resource centre, after a fundraising tea netted more than $5,000.

The tea, which attracted about 75 people, was organized by Fanny Pillersdorf, a Holocaust survivor who volunteers at the centre, and often speaks of her experiences to students in Toronto and Miami.

Carole Ann Reed, director of the centre, said the centre plans on renting space in the Albert J. Latner Jewish Public Library – across the hall in the Lipa Green building – to house a book and material collection. The present space will remain offices, and a lounge will be built, in which survivors can relax after giving a talk.

"Talking to students and adults is quite an emotional experience, and people often need a place to unwind," said Reed.

The centre also plans to purchase additional resource materials for teachers, she said.

Teachers particularly like the discovery trunk recently commissioned from the Vancouver Holocaust Centre, she said. "The trunk, called Beyond the Attic Walls, contains facsimiles of artifacts centred around the Anne Frank story, as well as facsimiles from a survivor from Holland. A teaching curriculum comes with the trunk."

They plan on commissioning another trunk about war orphans, called Journey to Canada. Included in the trunk will be such things as copies of identity papers, notebooks and newsletters from concentration camps, and photographs. Again, a curriculum will be included. "Part of our fundraising is to get more materials like this. They are in great demand."

Reed said that the tea, which is still bringing in some money, is the first social event ever to raise money for the centre.

It is "our duty to talk about the Holocaust, because it is so important for Jews to see what hate and racism can do to humanity," Pillersdorf said. "It is also essential to reach the second generation, so they can continue our work."

BBYO to celebrate 75th anniversary

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) has announced plans for its 75th anniversary celebration.

"BBYO has become one of the most important institutions in the Jewish community for encouraging young people to participate actively in leadership activities," said board chair Jeff Wagman.

To mark this milestone all BBYO alumni are invited to attend the reunion 8 p.m. Saturday, Nov. 13 at Beth Torah Synagogue.

"We are hoping that the thousands of alumni from over all Toronto and neighboring areas will come to share an evening of fun and memories," said Wagman.

To encourage people to register for this event, a special Web site has been set up at www.bbyo.on.ca/75.

Alumni are invited to register for the reunion and fill out information about their involvement in BBYO and also help to locate other members.

One of the goals of the evening is the launch of the BBYO Leadership Endowment Fund. "As BBYO prepares for the next 75 years, we must make sure that the organization has the resources to deliver the high-calibre leadership programming it has become known for in the community," Wagman said.

"This fund, with a target of $1 million, will help the organization maintain its position as the premiere Jewish leadership program."

BBYO Toronto Area Council, supported through grants by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is youth-run. The focus of the program is on leadership development and instilling positive Jewish values.

As part of an international organization based in Washington, D.C., BBYO members participate in social, community, cultural, religious and athletic activities.

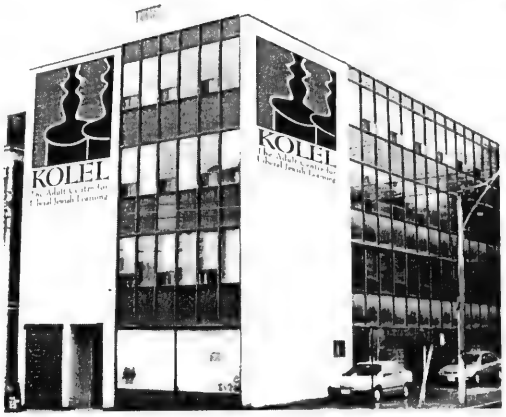
Kolel preparing to move into own home after 8 years



After eight years, Kolel will have a home of its own. The organization plans to move into the building at 151 Eglinton Ave. W. in mid-January.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After eight years, Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, will have a home of its own.

The centre, which has been running at Leo Baeck Hebrew Day School and other locations throughout the city, has bought a building at 151 Eglinton Ave. W., near Yonge Street. They expect to move in, in mid-January.

At the building's recent unveiling during a gala evening honoring Kolel's major donors, Kolel director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein said, "After eight years of wandering, we finally have a home that will be a beehive of Jewish activity and a centre of Jewish learning for everyone and anyone."

The 9,500-square-foot, four-storey building with wheelchair access has an elevator, six classrooms, four boardrooms, office space and an auditorium that seats up to 180 people. It will be available to community groups, and will offer childcare space. A library, a meditation area and a large student lounge will be added, and plans for a cyber-cafe are in the works.

"It is amazing that what began as an idea in 1990 with no mailing list and no students has grown into this. It is a huge development for us. I give credit to Toronto for sustaining such a program. We've grown from nothing to having this gorgeous building, with the help of our community. We're embarking on a furnishing campaign, and there is the opportunity for naming different rooms in the building," said Rabbi Goldstein.

Joanne Rose, chair of Kolel's board of directors, said that although some classes will still be held throughout the city, most will be in the new building.

"This building will give us a presence in the city and allow us to have a faculty. With over 1,500 students, we needed a centre," Rose said.

Kolel is also celebrating the establishment of the department of outreach headed by Rabbi Neal Loevinger, and the department of interactive technology headed by Baruch Sienna.

"The outreach department is intended to help people who are unaffiliated with the community. Kolel is a gateway to other facilities," Rabbi Goldstein said.

The priority of the department of interactive technology, funded by the Zukerman Family Foundation, said Sienna, a Jewish educator, is to produce high quality CD ROMS on Torah study. "The first CD ROM, Gates of Torah Volume 1, which will be available next month, includes a museum gallery of Torah ornaments and interactive exercises.

Stay connected with Torah

"Our second project will be to update the Kolel Web site, www.kolel.org. This virtual building has classrooms, a lobby, offices, and a place to leave messages. On some weeks, we have had over 200 visitors.

"With the introduction of online courses, we are providing students from all over the world, the opportunity to stay connected with Torah study," Sienna said.

Keynote speaker for the evening was Thomas Cahill, who wrote How the Irish Saved Civilization and The Gifts of the Jews. He said he has "never come across a religious community as extraordinary as Kolel. I am in awe of what is being done here.

"You have found an old way of meeting – in a building, and a new way of meeting – on the Internet. In every case, however, you are encouraging human interaction."

March OF THE LIVING

In the spring of 2000 join thousands of Jewish youth, adults and survivors from all corners of the world as they gather in Poland and Israel for an experience that will last a lifetime.

Women's health issues on NCJW's agenda

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada has a decidedly Winnipeg tint to its new executive.

The new national president is former Winnipegger Carol Slater, now of Vancouver, and another Winnipegger, Phyllis Spigelman, is national treasurer. Brenlee Gurvey Gales of Toronto, one of two national vice-presidents, is also originally from Winnipeg.

Torontonian Roz Fine is the other national vice-president and Lottie Copoloff of Montreal is national secretary. The immediate past president is Hinda Simkin of Vancouver.

The new executive was installed at the 30th Biennial Convention of the National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW) of Canada which was held in Winnipeg Oct. 16 to 18.

Along with the installation of its new slate of officers, NCJW honored past national president, Sharon Wolchock and her husband Sidney, for their contributions to the organization.

One luncheon, which was sponsored by Eli Lilly Canada Inc., focused on women's health issues. The main speakers were three Winnipeg-based healthcare professionals – Dr. Elizabeth Salamon, a specialist in endocrinology at the St. Boniface Hospital; Barbara Biladeau-Shumely, the director of the newly opened Breast Health Centre across from the St. Boniface Hospital; and Dr. Robert Corne, a cardiologist.

Corne noted that after menopause, a woman is twice as likely to die from heart disease than from all cancers combined. He reported that in 1997, 40,000 Canadian women died from cardiovascular disease. In many cases, there was no previous history of coronary disease.

Generally, women begin to be affected by heart disease 10 years later than men, Corne said. That may be one reason why doctors have tended to overlook the seriousness of the situation.

"A lot of women are likely to be diagnosed later than men and receive less aggressive treatment," Corne noted. "The perception is that diagnostic tests measuring heart disease are less accurate for women and that the disease in women is benign.

"Yet the reality is that the probability of complication is higher for women, as are the number of incidents of sudden death."

The "good news," he added, is that once a woman has a heart attack, she will receive the same aggressive treatment as a male patient. Corne also noted that the medical profession's attitude to women and heart disease has begun to change in recent years.

Preventive strategies include regular exercise, a healthy diet and a healthy lifestyle, he said. While estrogen does seem to protect pre-menopausal women from heart disease, Corne reported that contrary to popular belief, the jury is still out on whether estrogen therapy in post-menopausal women is effective in preventing the disease.

Speaking on breast cancer, Biladeau-Shumely reported that Ashkenazi Jewish women have a slightly higher genetic risk of developing the disease than the general population. She noted that one in nine women will develop breast cancer and that the risk factor increases with age.

Salamon's presentation was on osteoporosis, a bone disease that primarily affects women. She said women usually have smaller bones than men. After menopause, which is on average at age 52, women lose six to eight percent of their bone mass per year.

The most serious consequence of osteoporosis in later years is a hip fracture. More than 50 percent of women who suffer fractured hips in their later years die within two years from complications.

A second consequence is development of curvature of the spine, which causes back pain, and makes breathing difficult.

Salamon recommended regular exercise, vitamin D, and 1000 milligrams of calcium a day as preventive measures. An eight-ounce glass of milk contains 330 milligrams, she said, adding that skim milk has more calcium than whole milk.

Rabinovitch prepares to take helm of CBC

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The man who will be running the CBC for the next five years didn't have television in his home until he was about 12 years old, and then his parents strictly limited his viewing time.

"I didn't watch much TV as a child," said Robert Rabinovitch, 56, who takes over as CBC president Nov. 15.

"The first thing I saw on television was the coronation of Queen Elizabeth, at a friend's house, in 1953. We were definitely not the first on the block to get a set," he said.

That block was in the Darlington area, where Rabinovitch grew up. He went to elementary school at United Talmud Torahs, then on St. Joseph Boulevard.

What he remembers most about the CBC in its early years was his fascination with "the Indian head," the profile of a chief that was the station's test pattern.

In recent years, Rabinovitch admits he has not been glued to the CBC. That's partly due to having been busy as chief operating officer of Claridge Inc., a Bronfman family holding company, and sitting on several corporate boards, and, since July, chairing the McGill University board of governors.

But like most other Canadians, he chooses from the 100-plus, mainly American channels, cable brings into his home. He even admits to occasionally catching the new White House drama, The West Wing, on a rival network.

Rabinovitch believes the CBC, as a public broadcaster, can set a standard for quality and has an important role in keeping the country together.

"The CBC must recognize the new environment. Broadcasting has changed dramatically... The CBC monopoly is not there anymore, but that does not mean there is not a role for the public broadcaster. Because it receives government money, because it is not motivated solely by ratings and selling ads, it can do things no one else does."

One point Rabinovitch is definite on is that that the CBC should not try to emulate PBS in the United States, which he sees as spending too much time "pandering to the elite" and rebroadcasting British shows.

"The CBC has a broader mandate. Its job is to link the country, by explaining one part of it to another part... and to bring a Canadian interpretation to events," he said. There's a place for a wide variety of programming on CBC, including sports and entertainment.

One decision Rabinovitch has already made is that he will continue to make his home in Montreal.

Traditionally, CBC presidents have been based in Ottawa. However, he plans to divide his time between the main production centres here and in Toronto.

Rabinovitch moved to Montreal from Ottawa in 1985 when he left his post as deputy minister of communications. A civil service career that began at the start of the Trudeau era in 1968 came to an end when Brian Mulroney came into power.

Rabinovitch's parents, Sam, 89, who grew up in St. Henri, and Esther, 86, who immigrated to Canada at 7, are still living in Montreal.

His wife Cecil, a one-time executive-director of the Saidye Bronfman Centre, is well-established here. (She chairs the annual Jewish Film Festival.) Their daughter is studying at McGill, and a son is at the London School of Economics.

Rabinovitch himself is an economist by training, earning a master's and doctorate at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School, after a B.Com. from McGill. His entry into the civil service and specialization in broadcasting was a fluke.

He needed a computer to write his PhD thesis in 1968. The data he needed was stored on a mainframe in Canada, and he was not permitted to take it out of the country.

So he took a job with the Department of Finance mainly because they let him use their computer. He figured he'd stay around for eight months.

But Pierre Trudeau was elected that year for the first time, and Ottawa became an exciting place to be. Rabinovitch began working for the new secretary of state, Gerard Pelletier, in one of his areas of responsibility: broadcasting.

Soon he was advising the government on broadcasting and communications policies. In 1982, at 39, he was named a deputy minister.

After so many years as a civil servant and in corporate board rooms, Rabinovitch readily acknowledges that taking on the higher public profile required of a CBC CEO is not in his nature.

"I have been more comfortable in the backrooms. Giving interviews is not typical of me. I don't mind if my name doesn't get into the papers."

Rabinovitch is keeping his chairmanship at McGill, but is giving up his position at Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) as Quebec region chair of the executive.

"It would be a conflict of interest. The job of CJC is advocacy. It would be wrong for the head of the largest news organization in the country to be involved."

CJC Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard said Rabinovitch will be missed.

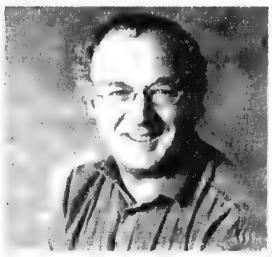
Just Between Us

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים



שמחה לאיד

מעולם לא הייתי מאוהדיו של בנימין נתניהו, ואת דיעותי גם ביטאתי מעל טור זה, אבל מה שעושים לו ולאשתו עכשיו מעיד לא כל כך עליו, אלא על הרשעות, צרות האופק וחוסר הנימוס הישראלי. אוקיי, מתנהלת חקירה האם האיש לקח איתו מתנות שניתנו לו כראש ממשלה ושהיו צריכות להישאר במחסן. אינני מתווכח עם התקנות, אבל לא ברור לי מדוע מתנות כאלה צריכות להישאר במחסן, מדוע לא יכול ראש ממשלה לשעבר לקחת איתו עם פרישתו מתנות שקיבל. זה צריך להיות כפוף לחוקים מסוימים, אבל למי בדיוק עוזרות המתנות האלה כשהן נמצאות במחסן מעופש באיזשהו משרד ממשלתי. מה-האיש לא תרם למדינת ישראל ולא זכאי לקחת איתו את זיכרונותיו? אבל זה לא העניין. ממש לא. נסות הרוח שבה מדליפה המשטרה לעיתונות חקירה אישית ופרטית היא תכונה ישראלית מרכזית. באמת אין לי חיבה עזה לשרה נתניהו, אבל היא בהחלט צדקה כשאמרה לשוטרים "ללאה רבין לא הייתם מעזים לעשות זאת". ארץ אוכלת יושביה, וממש לא עוזר שהשר לביטחון פנים הוא איש עדין ונעים הליכות כמו פרופ. שלמה בן עמי, גם הוא לא יכול לעצור את מפלצתיות היום יום . אבל שיישאר בינינו

באותו עניין:

מספר הפוליטיקאים שהועמדו לדין בישראל הוא עצום. רובם המכריע יצאו זכאים. ולמרות זאת- ממשיכה המשטרה להתנהג כאילו הם כולם אשמים אלא אם כן יוכח אחרת. בישראל רואה המשטרה לעצמה להישג גדול להצליח לשמור אנשים במעצר בזמן חקירת המקרה. רק בישראל, בטורקיה ובעוד כמה מדינות מזרחיות קיים הנוהג הזה. במדינה מערבית משאירים אדם במעצר רק אם יש לכך סיבה בטיחותית. עוד עניין שצריך לקוות שישונה במהרה.

בין וינזור ודטרויט:

אם בא לכם להרגיש את ההבדל בין ארה"ב וקנדה, תסתובבו בוינזור אונטריו ואז תחצו את הגבול לדטרויט, שתי ערים על שתי גדותיו של אותו נהר. עשיתי את זה לצורכי עבודה ממש פחד. החניתי את האוטו השכור כדי ללכת לפגישה רפואית בדטרויט ותוך דקה התחיל ללכת לעברי אדם שנראה כמו שלא איכפת לו להרוג מישהו אם יצאו לו מזה שני דולאר. בהחלט לא נעים. ובית החולים שבו נערכה הפגישה, בלב מרכז רפואי גדול במרכז דטרויט, נראה ספוקי לא פחות. הקופאי במגרש החניה הציץ אלי מבעד חלון ששברו עליו לפני מספר שעות,והשברים היו עדיין על הרצפה. עדין על הרצפה. אחר כך חזרתי לוינזור וברחובות היפים של העיירה הזו עבדו אנשים בגינות שלהם ודיברו עם שכניהם וברכו אותם לחג ההודיה. וכל ההבדל הוא נסיעה של חמש דקות, וכמובן, גבול שעובר באמצע. אבל שיישאר בינינו

CJC chair urges greater outreach to communities

KITCHENER — Keith Landy, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region (CJC) chair, made a recent commitment to make smaller Jewish communities a full working partner of the region.

Following its first officers' meeting outside the Greater Toronto Area, CJC Ontario region is calling on federations to strike a joint committee to address the urgent needs of students on campuses, particularly in communities without Jewish federations.

After hearing from student leaders at the open meeting at Congregation Beth Jacob in Kitchener, Landy promised that Congress would contact the federations about the lack of basic financial assistance and resources for the province's Jewish campus organizations and students, and propose a joint committee to address those needs.

"This is crisis situation," said Landy after listening to Heath Applebaum, chair of Kol Hastudentim, the representative body for Jewish students on 16 Ontario campuses, and leaders of a 20-person delegation from the Waterloo University-Sir Wilfrid Laurier University Jewish Student Association. Landy was especially concerned about the "disturbing" lack of funds and resources for the approximately 500 Jewish students at the Waterloo-area universities.

Most of the students come from Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. The organization operates without staff support.

Applebaum, who is also a CJC regional officer, told the meeting that this group last year received a $5,000 grant from UIA Federation of Canada, which CJC administered on their behalf. There has been no grant forthcoming for this fiscal year. The student-run body, in operation since 1996, functions as a unifying body by promoting, organizing and facilitating province-wide campus programs.

"This is our last chance at Jewishness before we go off into the working world," said Beth Suraski, co-president of Waterloo-Laurier Jewish Student Association.

Michael Soberman, regional director of community services and youth activities, pointed out that "a much higher percentage of Jewish students on smaller campuses participate in Jewish groups, partly because they are away from home. We, who service these students, have to ensure that there is Jewish life on campus. They want it."

Please see related story on page 36.

Landy said that he is committed to increasing CJC's contribution to servicing and responding to the needs of province's smaller Jewish communities. However, he pointed out that Congress is not a funding body.

The Kitchener meeting focused on CJC programs and services for small communities.

The region plans to hold some future meetings in other small communities including Sudbury, Peterborough and Guelph.

Co-chairs Malca Braker and Harriet Lyons examine a tallit.

Award for tallit-weaving

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Western Canada's only tallit-weaving program has been recognized by the Solomon Schechter award committee of the United Synagogues of Conservative Judaism with a gold medal in the category of Judaica and Fine Arts.

The tallit program was initiated in 1983 with the purchase of six table looms by the sisterhood of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Winnipeg's oldest and largest congregation.

"We run fall and spring sessions," says Malca Braker, who co-chairs the program with Harriet Lyons. "With seven looms, we can turn out 14 tallises a year. In the 10 years that we have co-chaired this project, our students have produced more than 150 tallises."

Often, the weaving is a family affair organized around a bar or bat mitzvah. The family chooses the colors and the design, and the finished product is presented formally on the bimah.

Last May, Lyons and Braker made a special tallit in honor of the 85th birthday of Rabbi Louis Berkal, who has been an integral part of the Shaarey Zedek for 45 years.

The looms have also been used to make Torah mantels, kippot, challah covers, and even a chupah.

Braker and Lyons said they were looking forward to attending the United Synagogues' Biennial Convention in early November in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., where they will be accepting the award on behalf of the synagogue.

Coast to Coast

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Not everything is as it seems.

The Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group is one of only three parliamentary associations with standing in the House of Commons.

CIPA (Canada-Israel Parliamentary Association), as it's commonly known, recently held its annual general meeting. Dr. Carolyn Bennett was re-elected as the chair of the group and talked about plans to expand CIPA's activities in collaboration with the Canada-Israel Committee and the Israeli Embassy.

The event, which was hosted by Israeli Ambassador David Sultan at his residence, was, by all accounts, a pleasant enough affair. However, with the exception of New Brunswick Senator Ermine-Joy Cohen, there wasn't a single Jewish parliamentarian present at the event. How strange – a parliamentary group whose only purpose is the promotion of friendship between Israel and Canada, and none of the Liberal MPs or senators, and only one of the four Tory senators bothered to make an appearance!

Their collective absence from the event is more than a little disturbing. Or, perhaps, not.

Is it possible that Jewish parliamentarians deliberately distance themselves from such events for fear of being too closely identified with a forum that unabashedly promotes Israeli and Canadian friendship? Perhaps their low profile is meant to allow for Israel's non-Jewish supporters in Parliament to take a more visible and public leadership role?

It could be that their absence is entirely strategic in nature and here's the rationale:

A substantial Jewish presence within CIPA would dominate the group. If the whole point is to attract increased support for Israel, then it makes sense for the Jews (presumed to be supportive in any case) to make room for their non-Jewish colleagues to assume a higher profile.

In addition, a pro-Israel group dominated by Jews would simply be dismissed as a "shell" and couldn't compare in credibility to a group dominated by non-Jewish politicians.

It may be that we are giving them more credit than they deserve. But the alternative interpretation is that their absence from the CIPA AGM is a reflection of indifference. Given the track records of most of the Jews privileged to serve in Parliament, the smart money is that they are anything but indifferent.

A DIVERSITY OF VIEWS IS A SIGN OF HEALTHY DEBATE. SENSATIONALISM AND SLANDER ARE NOT.

THROUGHOUT THE AGES, THE JEWISH COMMUNITY HAS HELD AS CENTRAL A COMMON VALUE OF CIVIL DISCOURSE. THROUGH THE WISDOM OF OUR TEACHERS AND TEXTS WE ARE CONTINUALLY REMINDED OF ITS IMPORTANCE AND SIGNIFICANCE.

UPHOLDING THIS CRITICAL BELIEF, A GROUP OF FOUNDATIONS AND PHILANTHROPISTS FROM ACROSS THE SPECTRUM OF JEWISH BELIEF HAVE JOINED TOGETHER TO DECLARE THAT WE BELIEVE IRRESPONSIBLE RHETORIC NEGATIVELY IMPACTS THE UNITY OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE.

AS FUNDERS, WE LOOK WITH DISFAVOR UPON INSTITUTIONS, OR INDIVIDUALS REPRESENTING INSTITUTIONS, WHO ENGAGE IN THIS DESTRUCTIVE PRACTICE. THE TONE AND CONTENT OF ADVERTISEMENTS AND PRONOUNCEMENTS FROM POTENTIAL GRANTEES HAVE NOW BECOME PART OF OUR FUNDING CRITERIA. REQUESTS FROM INSTITUTIONS WHICH ENGAGE IN THIS PRACTICE WILL BE VIEWED WITH A PREDISPOSITION TOWARDS A NEGATIVE RESPONSE.

IT IS OUR WISH TO FOSTER OPEN, HEALTHY DEBATE THAT PRESERVES AND ENHANCES THE DIGNITY OF ALL SEGMENTS OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE. FAMILY AND FRIENDS CAN ARGUE. IT IS OUR FERVENT DESIRE TO SEE THOSE ARGUMENTS BECOME LIKE THE DISPUTES OF HILLEL AND SHAMMAI: DISPUTES FOR THE SAKE OF HEAVEN.

Jewish student population growing at Queen's University

Academia

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Queen's University, for decades a bastion of white Anglo-Saxon Protestant culture, is finally ethnic blind. Robert Silverman exemplifies the startling transformation. For the past three years he has been dean of the faculty of arts and science, the first Jewish academic to hold that pivotal position.

"I like to think that Queen's in the late 1990s is pretty much ethnicity blind," he said in an interview. "The group currently on campus would likely make the traditional Scottish Presbyterian base of this university blink. We are making a conscious effort to encourage diversity in our population."

Queen's today hosts students from a melange of backgrounds, and while Silverman – a sociologist and a criminologist – cannot take credit for the fresh approach – he encourages it.

He is particularly pleased that Jews are gravitating to Queen's, in Kingston, Ont.

"Historically, Queen's has not been a popular destination for Jewish students, but things are getting better," he observed.

"We have an active Hillel, as well as a growing Jewish studies program. Gerald Tulchinsky, an important Canadian Jewish historian, has just become the new chair of Jewish studies.

"Queen's has the highest academic admission standards in the country. I hope that more good Jewish students will come here, as the Queen's experience is unbeatable. This sounds like an ad, but I really believe it."

Born in 1943, Silverman, a Torontonian, is the son of the late Sid Silverman, retailer, liquidator/auctioneer and a past president of Adath Israel Synagogue.

Silverman arrived at Queen's from the University of Alberta, where he had been director of the Centre for Criminological Research.

But within weeks of settling in, he was faced with an unpalatable situation. "I had to cut $5 million from the arts and science budget,'" he said. In his infinite wisdom, Premier Mike Harris had slashed transfer payments to Ontario universities.

Being resourceful, Silverman coped, keeping programs going while offering students "the kind of education Queen's is well-known for."

Indeed, since being installed as dean, Silverman has unveiled new programs and launched a process that, he hopes, will result in a global curriculum change. As he put it: "Arts and science is about one half of the university, so staying on top of things and keeping it running is, in itself, an accomplishment."

Asked what he has in store for the future, he replied, "I have a year and eight months left in this term as dean. We'll see."

A graduate of Toronto and Pennsylvania universities, Silverman is still very much of a researcher despite his heavy administrative duties.

"My current work involves adolescent and delinquent behavior,'" said Silverman. "It started from an interest in vandalism and testing theory, and is based on a survey I did in Edmonton."

A lot of his research, however, focuses on homicide. "As an area of study, homicide has the advantage of being very well reported in the media and of generating good data,'" explained Silverman, co-author of Deadly Deeds: Murder in Canada, a survey of homicide over the past 30 years.

Asked whether criminal violence is a function of poverty, genetics, psychopathology or conditioning, Silverman said, "This is a very big question. It is what all the books are about. But generally, we think that people learn how to behave in society."

Robert Silverman

In one of his first monographs, published in the journal Issues in Criminology in 1971, Silverman dealt with criminality among Jews.

"My conclusions were that Jews committed mainly white collar crimes and did not go to prison very often. I did not deal with the Jewish mob in that paper. Later in my graduate career, I was given a tour of a Philadelphia Jewish mob hangout by a U.S. Treasury agent."

It is virtually impossible to track the pattern of Jewish criminality in this country, he said. "In Canada, we do not collect the data that would make it possible to answer this question."

And, he added, no one knows how many Jews are behind bars in Canadian prisons in per capita terms compared to other minorities. "Statistics Canada does not report the ethnicity of the prison population. Besides, I have not studied Jewish criminality since that 1971 article.'"

In recent, independent studies, Scott Wortley of the University of Toronto and Frances Henry of the Ryerson School of Journalism reported that Canadian newspapers unfairly portray Vietnamese and Jamaicans.

Silverman has not read their papers, but says it is likely that the media is unfair in portraying visible minorities. "What happens is that when a member of a visible minority commits a crime and it is in the press, all members of that group are tarred unfairly with the same brush.

"When a white person commits a crime and it is in the press, there is no similar impact. On the other hand, if you ask, 'Are some minority groups over-represented in prison?' the answer is clearly yes."

Silverman takes a dim view of racial profiling, an increasingly popular procedure. "It's unfortunate in its consequences to innocent people who are stopped. But as a police practice, given what they think they

Air Canada and El Al reach an agreement

El Al has long contended that Air Canada enjoys an unfair advantage because of its proximity to the United States. The Israeli airline charges that most Air Canada passengers flying directly to and from Israel are Americans taking advantage of daily flights to and from Toronto or Montreal.

El Al asserts that this cuts into its lucrative U.S. business, and says that, to be fair, Canada should allow it to collect passengers to and from the States through Canada.

A year ago, Israel served notice to Canada that it would terminate a bilateral air agreement the two countries signed in 1987.

The agreement expires Nov. 9.

The dispute between the two air carriers even caused dissent in Israel's cabinet. Mordechai at first backed El Al, while tourism minister Amnon Lipkin-Shahak said Air Canada should be granted its three additional weekly flights.

In August, Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy discussed the impasse with his Israeli counterpart, David Levy, in an unpublicized meeting in Ottawa.

Ruth Ben-Tsur, who once headed the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto and is now Air Canada's general manager in Israel, last week told The CJN's Edgar Asher that reservations from Canada are at an all-time high, with advance bookings filled until the spring, based on seven flights a week.

She said it is not in Israel's interest to turn away tourists, and wondered why Air Canada should be penalized for its success. El Al should simply try harder and deal with a free market, she said.

She also told the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot that as of Nov. 9, El Al planes would be denied entry into Canadian airspace.

But Colin McKay, a spokesperson for Transport Canada said Ottawa is trying for a more conciliatory long-term solution.

"The solution we want is to increase the number of El Al flights to Canada, rather than constrain Air Canada," McKay told The CJN.

At the same time, however, McKay said Israel took "a very serious step" in terminating the air agreement it had with Canada.

He said that without an agreement in place, flights to and from Canada and Israel "would be up to each country." That could mean, in an extreme case, El Al revoking all landing rights to Air Canada, and Canada doing the same to El Al.

However, that's unlikely, McKay said.

Stan Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al, said this is a case of Israel trying to protect its government-owned airline.

"It's protectionism," he conceded, "but in a fair and equal way. Canadians protect their interests, and Israelis protect theirs."

Morais said fully 80 percent of Air Canada passengers to and from Israel are Americans, and that 70 percent of group traffic from Canada – including Christian pilgrims – fly El Al.

An irony arising from the dispute is that since Air Canada increased its weekly flights from four to seven, Canadian tourism to Israel has gone up by 25 percent, said Rob Ritter, national director of the Canada-Israel Committee.

New national campus plan helps to improve student life

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A new national campus plan has improved student life on campus, say student leaders and professionals.

The plan was created by UIA Federations Canada, the umbrella organization that assists federations in local fundraising and community building across the country.

Two of the plan's main goals are improving co-ordination among campuses and increasing the number of campus professionals.

Many of these goals have already reached fruition, according to the campus leaders and professionals.

Danielle Chahine, co-president of Queen's University's Hillel, has already noticed an increased co-operation among Jewish campus organizations.

"We're able to bring in bigger speakers. We're finding ourselves a lot more connected with other universities and planning a lot more joint events," she said.

Queen's Hillel already has two joint programs on its agenda: a Chanukah party at Waterloo University in November and a joint-campus Purim party in March.

A new staff person, Rosanne Brown, has been hired by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. She will supervise Jewish campus organizations in Guelph, Kitchener-Waterloo and Kingston.

Brown helped Queen's Hillel access resources for Holocaust Education Week by picking up materials from the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

Organizing Holocaust Education Week would have been difficult without Brown's help, and the contact with the Holocaust centre, Chahine said.

Jewish campus life at the University of Waterloo and Wilfred Laurier University has also improved due to the hiring of Brown, said Jeremy Shimkofsky, vice-president of programming for the Waterloo-Laurier Jewish Students Association.

"It's taken a lot of the load off the shoulders of the president and other executives," he said.

Shimkofsky believes that Brown will help maintain a sense of continuity at the Waterloo-Laurier students association, something that has been lacking because Jewish student executives often have to leave their posts for co-op terms, he said.

The plan, which aims to make Hillel: The Foundation For Jewish Campus Life a formal partner on Canadian campuses, is also improving life at the University of Manitoba and the University of Winnipeg by "enabling us to do things we wouldn't normally be able to do," said Aaron Katchen, director of the joint JSA/Hillel of the U of M and U of W.

The Jewish student group has already received funding from Hillel in the form of a Soref Initiative For Emerging Campuses, a grant designed for campuses with small Jewish communities. With this money, it held a Sukkot event called Pizza in the Hut.

Funding from Hillel will also improve this year's Western Canada ski trip in November, Katchen says.

The plan has created a better, more intimate campus structure, he said.

"We're paired up with campuses more like our own," Katchen said.

Sheldon Maerov, associate executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, said, "Now we have the ability to connect with every Jewish student on nearly every campus in Canada."

Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, agrees the plan has been a success, so far.

"For us, it's a major accomplishment. It doesn't mean our need for increased support and funding is over. Our needs grow...we still have a long way to go but it means we're getting there," he said.

Parental concern led to the changes

TORONTO — Seventeen years ago, community leaders gathered at the National Budgeting Conference for Canadian Jewry, and discussed the need to help Jewish students.

Many of them were parents who were worried about the state of Jewish campus services.

They wondered what services existed for students when they left home, said Sheldon Maerov, associate executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada.

Only a sprinkling of Hillel houses and other Jewish student centres existed on campuses, and while there were a few Jewish fraternities, the Jewish frat movement was dying out, Maerov said.

"At that time, there was a patchwork quilt of support programs on campus."

As a result of this disparity, parents became increasingly concerned that their children would be assimilated and would lose their Jewish identity, Maerov said.

Students have also expressed concern about the lack of Jewish campus support.

Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, recalls an incident at a national campus conference in London, Ont., held about eight years ago, when a Halifax student decried the lack of Jewish student services.

"I remember him saying, 'We don't get any support, there's no professional support or program resources,'" he said.

In November 1998, Heath Applebaum, then chair of Kol Hastudentim, an Ontario student-run body, spoke at a meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress officers, held in Kitchener, and said: "We can't continue co-ordinating the entire province alone. Investment needs to be made in campus services."

Within the last decade, B'nai Brith, traditionally an important source of Jewish campus funding, changed its focus because of financial difficulties, and withdrew some of its funding to youth.

The UIA stepped in, increased its funding and later formed the national Jewish campus services committee. This committee has joined forces with campus professionals from across Canada to introduce a new national campus plan, which was approved in January at a board meeting of UIA Federations Canada.

The campus plan they devised, which is currently being implemented on campuses across the country, divides Canada into three regions: western Canada; central Canada; and Quebec and Atlantic Canada.

Each region has an "anchor" – a campus organization chosen for its experienced staff, strong organizational structure and excellent track record in its own communities, said Maerov.

The anchor organizations are: Jewish Campus Services in Toronto, Hillel at University of British Columbia, and Hillel at McGill University.

"Because the country is so large, professionals and students need to link up with others regularly," he said.

It is hoped this regional structure will pull campuses in each region together to make the best use of money, resources and professionals, he said.

Professionals in each anchor organization are expected to help maintain communication between campuses in their region.

The plan also creates a new partnership between Hillel, UIA Federations Canada and UIA's member federations across Canada.

While many campus groups already have an affiliation with Hillel, this plan would formalize the relationship and increase Hillel's involvement in Jewish campus life in Canada.

"It means, for students there is more access to program resources, professional resources and financial support. We access Hillel's grant system and there's a commitment to bring its expertise and energy...to Canada," said Zac Kaye.

Zac Kaye

Presently, the majority of funding for campus services comes from UJA campaigns across the country, said Maerov.

While UJA will continue to fund a major portion of campus services, Hillel will step in to help Jewish campus organizations raise funds.

Hillel will also provide grants, especially to campuses with small Jewish communities, and assist in leader development and staff training.

"Hillel should become the primary resource for Jewish campus services in Canada because that is their [strength]" said Maerov.

The board of UIA Federations Canada will vote on this partnership with Hillel at its December board meeting.

know, it makes a certain amount of sense."

He does not think highly of a recent Angus Reid survey, in which seven out of 10 Canadians claim that sentences meted out to criminals should be more severe.

"My opinion is that seven out of 10 Canadians do not have a clue what current sentences are! Sentences in Canada are among the most severe in the world."

Silverman said criminology was not on his mind when he entered the University of Toronto as a freshman in 1962. He was originally interested in advertising and the law.

But as it turned out, Silverman majored in economics, with a minor in sociology. This led him to criminology. He decided to study the subject at the University of Pennsylvania because of its renowned faculty.

"One of my professors, Marvin Wolfgang, played an important role in showing that race was a factor in death penalty sentencing in the United States. My master's project – I did not do a thesis – used the race data to show there was prejudice against blacks in homicide sentencing in Georgia."

Silverman and his wife Elaine, who met at Bathurst Heights High School in Toronto, have two children. "Our older son, Jason, is in Jerusalem at a yeshiva. Our younger son, Michael, lives in Toronto."

In his spare moments, Silverman listens to jazz, plays the saxophone and clarinet, logs onto the Internet, reads novels and perfects his skill as a photographer. "If I had time to do any of these with consistency, I'd be very happy."

Barak to offer statehood to Palestinians

By AKIVA ELDAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The framework agreement to be signed by Israel and the Palestinians this February will include Israeli acceptance of the establishment of a Palestinian state in part of the territories, as a result of informal contacts between Israel, the United States and the Palestinian Authority.

The actual establishment of the Palestinian state will occur on the eve of the signing of the detailed final agreement, which is slated for the end of next year. Senior diplomatic sources explain that Israel prefers to sign an agreement with a recognized state rather than with a temporary authority or the Palestine Liberation Organization, which has signed agreements until now.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak would prefer that the implementation of the framework agreement take place only after the signing of the fully detailed agreement. But he does not object to the principle of the Palestinians' establishing their independent entity in any way they choose – including a sovereign state – as part of the framework agreement.

As a result of recent contacts between the parties, it appears Barak wants the framework agreement to include several key points:

• There will be no return to the 1967 borders;

• Settlements around Jerusalem and along the Green Line will be concentrated into three main blocks;

• Settlers choosing to remain in Palestinian-controlled areas will get special rights – as will Palestinians choosing to remain in Israel-controlled areas;

• Jerusalem will remain undivided but will be expanded to include Palestinian neighborhoods, with the Palestinians recognizing West Jerusalem as Israel's capital;

(No decision has been reached on the fate of the Old City. According to one proposal, offered by Ministers Yossi Beilin and Haim Ramon, the Old City would remain on the negotiating table for future talks.)

• The Palestinians will give up the right of return to territory inside the Green Line, but the refugees from 1967 will be allowed back into the territories according to the new entity's ability to absorb them. Israel will compensate the refugees from 1948 for their lost property and will enlist international support for their rehabilitation outside Israel;

• The Palestinian state will be demilitarized, and will not sign any military agreements with states hostile to Israel;

• The two sides will establish security arrangements to protect both states from external threats.

So far, the United States is backing the Palestinians' position calling for implementation of the framework agreement immediately upon its signing in February 2000.

According to an Israeli source close to the Palestinians, PA negotiators Abu Mazen and Abu Ala convinced PA Chairman Yasser Arafat that operative moves toward the establishment of a Palestinian state, even within temporary borders, should begin immediately after the signing of the framework of principles.

Barak knows that it is difficult to make a deal between a sovereign state and a national liberation movement. Such a deal is bound to last only as an interim agreement in which one side remains the occupier and the other remains the occupied.

Would be part of final deal

None of the agreements signed since Oslo, through the Sharm el Sheikh agreement, touched on the issue of sovereignty. So far, all the agreements have dealt with the division of responsibility, whether civilian or military, between the state of Israel and the temporary Palestinian Authority.

The Americans maneuvered within this asymmetric equation by referring to "the Israeli side and the Palestinian side."

But final status agreements are different. The PLO cannot be a partner to an international agreement that settles the conflict between two sovereign states. For example, the PLO cannot commit the Palestinian entity to refrain from military alliances with elements hostile to Israel.

Thus, heading into the final status talks, the issue of the partner has raised the question of the Palestinian state. How can Israel sign an agreement with a state before it is established? Especially when Israel's agreement to the establishment of such a state is an important negotiating card.

Barak's solution is found in the two-stage framework laid down at Sharm. A Palestinian entity will be the first article mentioned in the framework agreement to be signed in February.

That will allow Arafat to establish an independent state within the temporary borders of Area A on the eve of the signing of the final, detailed agreement – and allow the prime minister to head into a referendum with a draft treaty with a state, not with a former national liberation (terror) organization.

Islamic movement causes renewed concern

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

The Islamic movement in Israel is causing renewed concern. As a result of two major incidents late last summer, the spotlight has shifted to a movement which had been known exclusively for religious fundamentalism and good works in the Israeli Arab community.

On Aug. 29, Abdullah Agbariya, an Israeli Muslim, murdered two Jewish hikers, Yehiel Finfeter and Sharon Steinmetz, in the Megiddo forest. The indictment against Agbariya said he had acted after reading Islamic publications and listening to sermons in a mosque which convinced him that Arab lands had been confiscated by Jews, and that killing Jews is an Islamic commandment.

On Sept. 5, a day after Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat signed the Wye II memorandum in Egypt, three Israeli Muslims from the Galilee, including the imam of a village, were killed when the bombs they intended to plant on buses went off prematurely in Haifa and Tiberias.

Israeli security officials speculated that the bombers had been recruited by Hamas, whose suicide squads have claimed the lives of scores of Israelis since 1994.

Within weeks of these incidents, the Israeli government announced a package of surveillance measures designed to monitor the Islamic movement. Publications issued by the Islamic movement, and sermons delivered by imams in the movement's mosques, will be supervised with greater vigilance. In addition, an investigation into the funding sources of institutions associated with the movement was launched.

The Islamic movement, whose emergence was influenced by the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran, is split into two wings.

The southern wing, headed by Sheik Abdullah Nimr Darwish, is known for its moderation. He lives in Kfar Kassem, where 49 villagers were slain in 1956 for breaking a curfew. Until 1966, Israeli Arabs lived under direct military rule.

Darwish, a former radical who was imprisoned for two years in 1981 after burning Jewish farmers' fields, supports the Oslo peace negotiations, calls for Arab-Jewish coexistence, has consistently condemned Palestinian terrorist attacks, and participates in Israeli politics. Two of his acolytes are members of the United Arab List, the largest Arab party in the Knesset.

The northern wing, led by Sheik Raed Salah Mahajneh, mayor of Umm el Fahm, the second largest Arab town in Israel, tends toward radicalism. It is critical of Oslo, takes a separatist approach to Israeli national affairs and has accused Israel of trying to undermine Muslim rights in Jerusalem.

Mahajneh, however, has condemned, and disassociated himself from, all acts of violence. His associate, Suleiman Aghbariya, deputy mayor of Umm el Fahm, has been detained by police several times on charges of transferring funds to Hamas, but was released each time due to lack of evidence.

The events in Megiddo, Haifa and Tiberias beg a question: Are Israeli Arabs, who constitute 20 percent of the population, loyal to the state? Historically, very few have been charged with security offences.

But since the Six Day War, Israeli Arabs have undergone a gradual process of Palestinization and radicalization. Some Israeli Arabs, for example, believe that Israel should be a secular rather than a Jewish state, and that Zionist institutions such as the Jewish National Fund should be phased out.

Although equal under the law, Israeli Arabs are in practice second-class citizens. In a recent commentary in Ha'aretz, Moshe Arens, a former defence minister, wrote that successive Israeli governments have not dealt fairly with them. They face discrimination in employment and housing, their lands have been expropriated, and Arab municipalities and schools do not receive a fair share of government funding. "It is high time for (Israel) to address the problems of Israel's Arab minority," he warned, adding that current conditions are pushing Israeli Arabs toward hostility and a growing sense of alienation.

The alarm has been sounded.

The Week in Israel

Oct. 25

• Israel opened a safe-passage route for Palestinians travelling between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

• Prime Minister Ehud Barak travelled to Turkey to help open a housing project for victims of the earthquake that devastated Turkey in August. Israel added more than $4 million (US) to some $1 million raised by Israeli and Jewish groups for the project.

Oct. 26

• Israeli troops fired rubber bullets at Palestinians protesting in Bethlehem against a soldier's killing of a Palestinian earlier in the week. The Palestinian had attempted to stab the soldier.

Oct. 27

• Barak phoned Jordan's King Abdullah to mark the fifth anniversary of the peace treaty between the two countries.

• Barak appointed David Ivry to serve as ambassador to the United States. Ivry is the head of the National Security Council, former head of the air force and a former director general of the defence ministry.

• According to accusations made public this week, the publishers of two of Israel's major newspapers were the assassination targets of the publisher of Ma'ariv, Ofer Nimrodi.

Oct. 28

• Barak named the nation's current ambassador to Jordan, Oded Eran, to serve as the head of the team that will negotiate a final peace agreement.

• A court ordered the Islamic Movement in Israel to dismantle a protest tent that has become the focal point of a dispute between Christians and Muslims in Nazareth.

Oct. 29

• Israel and Mauritania established full diplomatic ties. The Arab League nation becomes the third Arab country, after Egypt and Jordan, to agree to send ambassadors to the Jewish state.

Obituary Former British chief rabbi passes away

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Britain's former chief rabbi, Lord Immanuel Jakobovits, died Sunday at the age of 78, from an apparent brain hemorrhage.

He was laid to rest Monday on the Mount of Olives in an official ceremony attended by representatives of Britain's Jewish community and Israeli religious leaders.

Lord Jakobovits' successor, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, issued a statement saying, "Lord Jakobovits was the outstanding rabbinic figure of his generation. He led the Jewish community with great dignity, wisdom and courage. His influence was immense. He was a giant of the spirit, and we mourn him deeply."

The Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization of Britain's Jewish community, said, "Lord Jakobovits had a deep moral conviction which displayed itself in the manner in which he led the Jewish community during his time as chief rabbi, and in his later years as a peer in the House of Lords. He will be sorely missed, not only by the Jewish community but by British society as a whole."

Lord Jakobovits was chief rabbi of Britain from 1967 to 1991. He attended religious services as usual on Friday and Saturday and showed no sign of ill health. A memorial service was held Sunday at the Hendon Synagogue in North London, after which the rabbi's body was flown to Israel.

Britain was represented at the funeral by Lord Michael Levy, who brought with him a letter signed by British Prime Minister Tony Blair. Blair said Rabbi Jakobovits "was a man deeply respected and widely admired throughout the whole of this country for his faith, his ability and his courage. He will be sorely missed."

William Hague, leader of the Conservative party, said, "I am profoundly sad to hear of his death. He will be long remembered as both a leader and a teacher, unwavering in his commitment to moral responsibility, education and tradition."

Rabbi Jakobovits was born in Koenigsberg, Germany, on February 8, 1921. He came to Britain in 1936, and the rest of his family fled Berlin and joined him two years later, following Hitler's rise to power.

He was educated at Jews' College, London and at the University of London. He was chief rabbi of Ireland at the age of 28 and in 1958 became first rabbi at New York's Fifth Avenue Synagogue, a post he held for nine years. He was a respected authority on Jewish medical ethics.

Rabbi Jakobovits served as governor of several Israeli universities and as the president of the Conference of European Rabbis. He believed the destiny of Israel was to become "a beacon of light to other nations."

He received a knighthood in 1981 and was given a peerage by the Thatcher government in 1988 – the first Jewish religious leader to ever be made a lord.

He is survived by his wife, Lady Amelie Jakobovits – whose own personality and caring qualities contributed immensely to his rabbinate – and by children and many grandchildren in Israel, the United States and Britain. He is also survived by brothers in Toronto (Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits), Montreal (Rabbi George Jakobovits), London and Israel.

'Rav Jakobovits was a leader in advance of the Establishment'

By PAUL SHAVIV
Special to The CJN

Rav Jakobovits – as he preferred to be known – was a distinguished, unusual and very brave Orthodox rabbi, independent of thought and opinion, and a leader far in advance of the Anglo-Jewish Establishment.

After fleeing from Germany as a teenager, and completing his rabbinical studies in London, he served as chief rabbi of Ireland from 1949-1958, and then as rabbi of New York's Fifth Avenue Synagogue.

There, he was one of the group centred around the magazine Tradition who began formulating the ideology that later became known as Modern Orthodoxy, although Rabbi Jakobovits was never comfortable with either the name or, later, the positions with which the group was identified.

His Jewish antecedents were from a world that has almost disappeared from today's Jewish stage. It had its roots in Hirschian Germany, and combined a profound belief in halachic, Orthodox Judaism with a sensitivity to universal vision, and a willingness to embrace the world rather than withdraw from it. He was named after Immanuel Kant, who came from the town of his birth, Koenigsburg.

In 1966, he was appointed as chief rabbi of Great Britain, and arrived in London to take up his post in the weeks before the Six Day War.

In the tense days before war broke out, he addressed a mass rally of British Jews in London's Royal Albert Hall. Few who were there will ever forget his commanding presence, his inspiring words and the impression he made on his community.

He arrived into an English community still mentally stuck in Victorian times, whose Jewishness was almost an embarrassment to them, and who had no concept of community activism.

Through his creation of a major foundation, which funded a series of educational initiatives, Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits changed the face of Jewish education in Britain. For England it was revolutionary, and was part of many enormous changes he brought to the Chief Rabbinate and to the image of the Orthodox rabbi in Britain.

'He was a passionate Zionist'

Equally visionary were his views on Israel and Zionism. He was a passionate Zionist, but followed no party line, and resolutely refused to be identified with any political group.

From 1967 onwards, he advocated three policies on Israel with equal energy: the pursuit of peace with the Palestinians, including territorial compromise; the use of education rather than politics or legislation to advance Jewish values and Judaism in Israeli society; and the need for Israel to see itself in the framework of the religious, universal vision of Judaism that he himself espoused.

His views were expressed fearlessly and publicly. They made him unpopular with many constituencies, and there were periods when he was persona non grata in Israel itself, and in many Orthodox circles.

Many, however, were glad to hear support from such an eminent quarter; others, who disagreed with him, nevertheless respected his integrity, moral courage and religious vision.

By the early 1980s, he had become a national figure in British society. He was as comfortable speaking to politicians, cardinals and professors as he was giving a Talmud shiur.

Margaret Thatcher compared him favorably as a religious leader to the Anglican bishops. On retirement, in 1990, he was created a life peer, and sat in the House of Lords, where he gave several notable speeches on social issues. In 1991 he was awarded the Templeton Prize as an outstanding world religious leader.

His major interest in Judaism was the application of Halachah to modern medicine. His doctorate was on the subject of Jewish Medical Ethics, and it may be said that he invented the now-fashionable field. He often remarked that had he not have entered the rabbinate, he would have been a doctor.

In an age when conformity and particularism characterise much of the Orthodox world, Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits was an impeccably Orthodox non-conformist and universalist. Even before he was "officially" an aristocrat, he brought an aristocracy of mind and of presence to the Jewish community.

The world and the Jewish world are poorer by his passing.

Paul Shaviv is headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

ANNOUNCING

THE BRONFMAN YOUTH FELLOWSHIPS IN ISRAEL 2000

For the fourteenth consecutive sumer, a group of outstanding Jewish teenagers in the U.S. and Canada, coming from a wide variety of backgrounds and entering the twelfth grade of school, will be recipients of the Bronfman Youth Fellowships*. They will spend five fulfilling weeks of study, dialogue and travel in Israel.

The Bronfman Fellows will be selected on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities. Merit, not financial need, is the program's selection standard. Fellowship activities begin June 27th, with a return from Israel August 3rd. All meals will be kosher, and Sabbath activities will be in keeping with the sanctity of the day.

Based in Jerusalem, the Fellows will engage in an intense interaction with a diverse rabbinic faculty and counselors, representing a wide range of Jewish perspectives. They will explore Jewish texts against the background of Israel's land, culture and customs ... meet with Amitei Bronfman, our Israel counterpart program ... take part, at a time of rapid change, in seminars with some of the country's leading political and cultural figures ... debate ideas and search for insights on the different ways to define oneself as a Jew today, all in an atmosphere of mutual respect and open dialogue.

The purpose: to return home with a new understanding of the myriad issues facing the Jewish people and the Jewish state, and a new appreciation of the need for dialogue among Jews of all kinds.

* Fellowships cover all expenses including roundtrip transportation between New York and Israel, room and board and travel in Israel.

For a descriptive brochure and application form, please call or write at once to:

Switzerland latest far right flash point

By FREDY ROM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZURICH — Fears that voters across Europe are succumbing to the pitches of hard-right populists were given credence by the latest election results in Switzerland.

As a result of last week's parliamentary vote, widely described by Swiss commentators as marking a watershed in Swiss politics, the right-wing People's party came in second and is poised to snare a larger role in the government.

Political analysts here were stunned by the showing of the People's party, which had campaigned on a nationalist, anti-immigrant platform and had called on Switzerland not to join the European Union.

In 1995, the party placed a distant fourth.

Last week's vote took place less than a month after Austria's Freedom party, led by populist firebrand Jorg Haider (notorious for past comments praising Hitler and the SS), came in second in that nation's parliamentary elections.

The voting in Switzerland threw a spotlight on the dominant figure of the People's party, Christoph Blocher.

Political commentators are already speculating that Blocher, the head of the Zurich branch of the party, may get a cabinet seat.

Swiss Jewish leaders have repeatedly spoken out against Blocher, who has made speeches before Parliament laced with thinly veiled anti-Semitic appeals.

In 1997, when Switzerland was confronting charges that it profited from wartime dealings with the Nazis, Blocher launched a campaign to prevent public funds from being used to support victims of the Holocaust.

That same year, Blocher, a millionaire businessman, told a rally that Switzerland had no reason to apologize for doing business with Nazi Germany.

Now, Jewish leaders are warily watching the ascent of Blocher and his party.

"We are concerned and worried" about the showing of the People's party, Thomas Lyssy, vice-president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland, told JTA.

A leader of Geneva's Jewish community, referring to the campaign Blocher launched in 1997, said Blocher has been rewarded by Swiss voters for his insistence that the government should not pay a cent for any "wrongdoing perpetrated by the Swiss during World War II."

Drawing more fire from Jewish leaders here and abroad, Blocher told the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot last week the threats of a boycott that Jewish groups made against Swiss firms in 1997 and 1998 were similar to Nazi-era boycotts of Jewish businesses.

Those threats came during a period of often-contentious negotiations in which Switzerland was being urged to settle Holocaust-era claims.

In August 1998, Switzerland's two largest banks agreed to a $1.25-billion settlement of those claims.

The tactics Jewish groups used during those negotiations were "clear blackmail," Blocher told Yediot, adding that those actions left many Swiss people feeling "threatened and extorted."

Not all of the leadership of the People's party is happy with some of the elements supporting Blocher.

Adolf Ogi, a popular member of the party who serves as defence minister, said in an interview after the election that "extremists and anti-Semites have no place" in the Swiss political spectrum.

Who helped Papon flee?

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — After 18 years of legal manoeuvering, convicted Nazi collaborator Maurice Papon is finally behind bars.

But questions persist about the preferential treatment the 89-year-old former Vichy official appeared to have enjoyed.

Swiss police seized Papon late last week in a hotel in a swanky ski resort and whisked him back to France, where he was taken to a prison hospital.

Papon had fled to Switzerland on Oct. 10, some 10 days before a Supreme Court appeals hearing was held last week that upheld his 10-year prison sentence for crimes against humanity.

He was found guilty of helping deport some 1,500 Jews to Nazi death camps during World War II.

At the beginning of Papon's trial in Bordeaux in October 1997, the presiding judge allowed him to remain free during the proceedings in an unusual decision that triggered outrage among the civil plaintiffs, most of them relatives of Jews who had been deported to Nazi death camps.

This is why, even after his conviction, Papon stayed out of prison pending his Supreme Court appeal. When he fled into exile, he was certain he would lose his appeal.

"The question that has to be answered is whether he benefited from any collusion or help in fleeing," said Alain Jakubowicz, president of a regional branch of the CRIF, France's umbrella group for Jewish organizations, and lawyer for B'nai Brith France in the case.

French prosecutors are planning to investigate who helped Papon flee to Switzerland.

Under French law, aiding a fugitive can result in a three-year prison term and a heavy fine.

In a related development, the Swiss Foreign Ministry confirmed to JTA last week that it had received information, two weeks before Papon fled France, that he was going to come to Switzerland.

But the ministry did not act on the information, which came from a former Swiss ambassador to France, Eduard Brunner.

One of Papon's most ardent defenders confirmed this week the existence of an underground ring of retired military officers and former Resistance fighters with close ties to conservative Catholic organizations. The network was reportedly responsible for initial rumors, made in an attempt to throw pursuers off his track, that Papon had fled to Spain.

Papon's closest associates reportedly visited him at his villa near Paris earlier this month and urged him to leave France before he was due to enter jail, as is customary in France, on the eve of his appeal.

His supporters regard Papon as a heroic figure who was made a scapegoat for the Vichy regime's collaboration during the Nazi occupation.

"He always made a point of cultivating influential people, as if he feared that his past would eventually catch up with him," said one French journalist who has followed Papon's career closely.

A French historian who recently interviewed Papon believes he was terrified of going to jail after spending just two days behind bars at the start of his trial.

According to Michel Berges, Papon had complained bitterly about the primitive cells, filthy toilets and terrible food, before the presiding judge granted him bail on grounds of age and ill health.

A number of measures could have been taken to avoid Papon's flight.

Months before his initial trial, Nazi-hunter Serge Klarsfeld asked the Justice Ministry to confiscate Papon's passport. But Klarsfeld's demand was ignored.

"The government and the justice system are fully responsible for Papon's flight out of France. If he had raped a little girl, they would have found some procedural means to prevent him from leaving," said lawyer Arno Klarsfeld, Serge's son.

Design duo influenced by Japanese fashion style

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

When fashion designers Lori Barnes and Lauren Leibovitz became cousins through marriage, the two discovered that, in addition to family, they also shared a philosophy of fashion.

To celebrate the amalgamation of their talents, Leibovitz and Barnes recently showed their first collection for spring 2000, called Ambient Factors, at a Wellington Street warehouse where the media, buyers and a celebrated clientele checked out their creative stylings.

"We are very influenced by the simplicity of the Japanese fashion concept," Barnes says of their designs. "The Japanese artistic sensibility remains classic. They've managed to capture something that is always in style. We also look at the trends and try to incorporate them here and there.

"Many of our designs have bell sleeves and funnel necks. We do mainly wraps. Only one jacket has buttons on it. Everything has hidden closures; we use velcro combined with ties and inside hooks and eyes. It looks clean."

Leibovitz and Barnes design both off-the-rack clothing and custom-made orders to suit all ages and a variety of body shapes.

Their layered pieces are interchangeable, from crossover tops to full length and cropped jackets to wrap skirts and flat front pants, in fabrics of supple leather, crushed organza, sheer and shine, opaque and stretch in sizes 4 to 14.

Leibovitz and Barnes design in neutrals of black, grey and white. This year's leather collection offers a burst of color in lilac. Next year, there are plans to introduce blue.

Lori Barnes (left) and Lauren Leibovitz.

Off-the-rack styles will be available across Canada this spring. There are 25 different pieces in the collection, priced from $95 to $495. Leather pieces cost between $220 and $850. Custom orders are currently being taken.

Customers already boasting a Leibovitz and Barnes design include actor Sonja Smits, CityTV producer Deb Devine (wife of Eugene Levy), and members of Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman's family.

"Everything we do, we make a conscientious choice," Barnes says. We use fabrics that are good for the environment. We don't like to do things that are faddy, done just for the sake of glitz. We want our designs to be something people can keep wearing by combining items with fashions that come out next season."

Barnes and Leibovitz are no strangers to Canada's fashion scene. Prior to joining forces, both women had achieved success. Leibovitz, born in Johannesburg, South Africa, has 17 years in fashion designing for both children and women. Her custom designs won the 1996 Yorkdale New Designer Discovery Award from Toronto's Yorkdale Shopping Centre.

For 15 years, Barnes, a native Torontonian, designed clothes for a variety of Canadian companies. In the mid-'80s, Barnes and then-partner, Peter Dawe, formed Nero Leather. The team garnered the 1986 City of Toronto's Young Fashion Designer Award for their leather couture.

The successful partnership came to an end when Dawe moved to Montreal and Barnes became a new mother and decided to try her hand at designing organic cotton childrenswear from home.

Barnes began working with Leibovitz four years ago. They formed their partnership two years later.

"The two of us have very different strengths," Barnes says. "Lauren is the fire. She really moves and she's very good at dealing with people. I go a little slower. I'm very organized and I enjoy all the little details. The combination works because we found we have very similar design styles."

The designers wanted to go into a business they could really enjoy while making a living. They are located in a spacious manufacturing facility and employ seven full-time staff and several part-timers.

Beauty SHOP

By CAROL WISE

Is it the capricious special effects of high-tech, sci-fi movies such as The Matrix that are causing this flurry of shine-induced make-up? Clearly, whatever it might be, the trend this winter is shine and more shine. From head to toe, your whole body can glisten and glow. It's such fun, you should try it, even if it's just for a night.

Colors for winter will be bold and bright. Orange is making a smooching comeback, although berries and currants will be most popular. Eyes will be colored with the smokiest shades and painted with black eyeliner. The result: nothing but alluring.

Harsh, cold winds dry your skin, so use richly formulated creams to moisturize and cleanse. Drink at least eight glasses of water a day and treat yourself to a facial, or be sure to do it at home. This is the worst season for accumulating dead cells that sit on the surface of your skin and actually prevent your moisturizer from doing its job. Exfoliate, moisturize and use treatments regularly.

Exercise is especially important this season. Clothing is fitted and feminine, so keep that tummy trim. Good circulation will also help you survive the cold weather and make you look and feel healthier. You don't want to get the winter blahs.

CAROL'S TIPS

Skin Care: If you are tired of makeup that won't budge, use Take it Away from Estee Lauder. It's a unique cream-gel that is very gentle and removes all makeup – face, lip and eye – even long-wearing, waterproof formulas.

Canderm introduces a face cream that helps reduce the redness of Rosacea – the name – Rosacure. Its combination of synergistic active ingredients reduces the skin's microcirculation and erythema. Botanico eye and lip compresses from Borghese are fabulous. The eye compresses reduce puffiness with anti-inflammatory, soothing plant extracts. The lip pads deliver immediate and intensive moisture, leaving the mouth area looking relaxed and subtle. Both these products are a perfect pick-me-up.

Biotherm's Aqua Relax is truly an invitation to relaxation and well being. The six luxurious body care products with essential oils will turn your bathroom into a place of serenity and renewal.

Lancaster's Skin Therapy Oxygen Mask and Suracif Retinol Deep Lift Relaxing Mask both heighten the effectiveness of the skin's natural moisture and help to repair and rejuvenate. The oxygen mask boosts the skin's hydration level and helps to eliminate skin dullness. The retinol mask gently fights signs of aging and also provides a boost to tired and stressed skin. Both these masks will provide excellent results in 10 minutes.

Le Baisser by Lalique

Foundation: Christian Dior invents Teint Diorlift, a smoothing anti-fatigue foundation. This unique formula promises to keep us looking fresh as a daisy, no matter what our age or how late at night. This might be the answer to looking good through long days and late-night holiday parties.

Estee Lauder presents the Golden Millennium Compact. It is absolutely gorgeous! On its exquisite gold lid there is an hourglass of crystal sparkles that opens into the year 2000 – a real keepsake.

Eye Candy: Dress up your eyes with Quo sultry eye colors. Morph eyeshadow is a super-frosted, pearly cream that is sure to create a sexy mystique. High pearl two-in-one eyeshadow Duo in Night Light, with icy aqua and frosty white shadows, gives lids a glimmering appeal. A high pearl eye defining pencil in electric brown shimmers with flecks golden light.

Sweet Cheeks: Estee Lauder's multi-colored Glitter Stick will not only enliven your cheeks, but try it on your temple, décolletage, shoulders and back. Perfect for a romantic rendezvous.

For the very daring, try Christian Dior's Night Glow Pencil – dots, swirls and stencils that will magically come alive in the dark and be invisible in the day. Have fun and draw freckles on your nose and a butterfly on your cheek.

Hair: Daniel, proprietor of Salon Daniel (79 Yorkville Ave.), says that hair fashion will be about total freedom, tousled, with lots of movement, texture and bounce. It's all in the cut, says the designer to many of the fashion and media cognoscenti in Toronto. Women are busy and it is essential that they can do their hair quickly themselves.

It is important to keep your hair shining, and a great way to do this, says Daniel, is to treat your hair to a L'Oreal Powerdose treatment. This terrific formula provides instant long-lasting restoration of dull sensitized hair. It is simply rinsed in your hair and reconstitutes the internal structure of your hair. It is particularly good for fine hair.

Luscious Lips: Tour de Rouges by Dior is a five-compact lipstick, one on top of the other. They are beautifully enclosed in a see-through cover, including a lovely brush. Don't miss this limited edition of five shimmering shades from light to dark – use them alone or have fun and paint them all together.

Chanel lips this season dazzle with four exquisite new colors sprinkled delicately with stardust. The star of the galaxy is Levres Reflets, the creation of all the four colors in one sleek compact.

Check out Lauders' HighShine Lip Lacquer in Purple 2000 – very interesting.

Fragrance: Chanel's Allure Homme aftershave moisturizer is an easily absorbed emulsion that moisturizes while soothing razor burn.

Clinique gets happy again with Happy for Men. It's a complex blend of exotic citrus that provides a refreshing blast.

Romance from Ralph Lauren is for men or women. It captures intimacy, warmth, and often a loving partner.

Hiris, the new fragrance for women.

Channel #5 bath care products are a must for the season. The pressed bath powder, body cream and bath soap are just gorgeous. Let all your troubles disappear in the midst of this sensational scent.

Now, don't miss Christian Dior's Jadore. It's for all women who love to be adorned to be adored. It's fresh, cheerful and very feminine.

Le Baiser de Lalique is a female pink liquid slipped into a bottle that features lovers entwined by a trellis of roses. A bouquet of glass roses crowns an irremovable golden metal spray cap. It's scent is pure joy – a work of art.

Hiris, the new fragrance for women by Hermes, is a solifloral, fully built around one exceptional ingredient, the iris. This warm, yet light fragrance is like summer all year.

Le Baiser is available at the Lailique Boutique and Hiris at the Hermes Boutique, both at 131 Bloor St. W. Hiris is also available at all Holt Renfrew stores.
